One Life's Journey

"We travel not to escape life, but for life not to escape us." –Anonymous

I AM NOT THE WORLD'S greatest traveler, but I've seen some of this world and I'm itching to see more. As a young man, I backpacked through Europe twice in the early 1970s. Those journeys exploded the worldview of a middle-class kid from the suburbs. On one trip, my buddy Todd and I hitchhiked through Germany on the autobahn. We picked up a lucky lift entering an incredibly long tunnel—through the Swiss Alps—on our way to Italy, in return for babysitting the well-behaved dachshund of our driver. In Florence, we overdosed on Renaissance art and bunked in Mussolini's mistress's villa, which had long before been converted into a youth hostel.

I was looking for love, but I fell into a different kind of romance on those trips, the reverie of an innocent abroad: scuffling across ancient cobblestones in my Frye motorcycle boots, inhaling history measured not in decades but in centuries.

The author and traveling companion Todd Ryan as sketched by Ryan in the early 1970s during one of their adventures

In the years since, I haven't done as much traveling as I imagined I would. Life is more complicated than it was zooming through the Alps with my only job as a dog sitter. But things are looking more promising in that area, for me and maybe for you too.

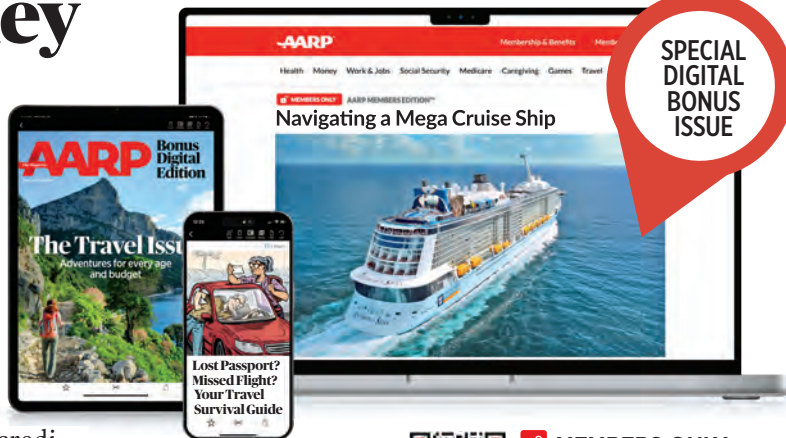

In the AARP Travel Trends survey, older adults told us they planned to spend an average of about $6,700 on travel this year, and about 40 percent of those traveling were planning an international trip. Where to? Europe is the most sought-after destination. Indeed, I visited Paris in May, this time staying in a fancy hotel, and I had only to look across the room to my lovely wife for romance.

So, yes, hail fellow travelers! In this issue you'll find a feature on "ancestry travel," the art of finding your roots. It's an excerpt from our new, special issue devoted solely to the joys of travel itself: aarp.org/travelissue.

In the digital-only Travel Issue, you'll find destination ideas for special occasions, thoughtful advice on managing your travel dollars (is that splurge really worth it?), secrets to great experiences that only people who work in hotels and on cruise ships know, an emergency guide to avoid travel disasters and more. Each story has you, the older traveler, in mind.

Let's get packing (we have tips for that too). Your life awaits.

Membership Dues to Increase in 2025 But you can save by renewing now at current prices

WE KNOW OUR members care about saving money, and we have worked hard to keep the cost of an AARP membership affordable. Our dues haven't changed in 15 years. To continue delivering the high-quality membership you have come to expect, we are increasing AARP dues starting in 2025. The price will increase from $16 to $20 for a one-year membership. Members can always save by choosing the auto-renew option or multiyear terms.

We believe AARP membership remains a great deal. Members have access to AARP's award-winning publications; everyday discounts on travel, restaurants, gas and cellphone plans; access to quality insurance products; resources on caregiving and safety from scams; and exclusive digital content with AARP Members Edition, free movie screenings and more. Membership dues also support AARP's national and local efforts to strengthen Social Security and Medicare and to provide custom programs like AARP Fraud Watch Network and Staying Sharp.

To extend your membership now at the current pricing, visit aarp.org/lockinsavings.

Our August/
September issue featured
Kevin Costner.

COSTNER'S CRAFT

Great read ["Kevin Costner Goes His Own Way"]! I loved both of Costner's "flops," Waterworld and The Postman. I know I'm not alone in that assessment. Hold your head high on those two as well, Kevin!

HEATHER SPARKS
Yakima, Washington

ESTATE EXECUTOR

I was the executor of my mother's estate ["My Mom Died. Then Came the Ordeal"]. She had a trust in place, prepaid for cremation, and I was on her credit union accounts, so that part was simple enough. But the IRS chore (her final tax return and the estate tax return) wasn't. In hindsight, I wish I had explored hiring a CPA. I got caught in a slow process and had to keep the trust accounts open longer than necessary just waiting on the final refund to be deposited.

LINDA TAYLOR
Luther, Oklahoma

Having your parent add you to their accounts is a great idea. My dad did that, and it made things so much easier for me. But be aware that these will show up on your credit report, even if you are not actively using the accounts. It can also give the impression that you live at two different addresses (in my case, in two states).

CHRISTINE WYLLIE
Winfield, Illinois

Loved the first Horizon movie. Fantastic acting and the scenery was breathtaking!
Jean Gieraltowski
Facebook

He's brought incredible vision and insight to the movie industry.
Geoff Ready
Facebook

A genuine, cool and brilliant filmmaker, as if being an excellent actor wasn't enough!
Christine Levens Lynch
Facebook

FOR A LAUGH

I enjoyed "SNL Hits the Big 5-Oh." One of the early highlights was the April 17, 1976, guest cameo by President Gerald R. Ford. Chevy Chase jokingly mocked Mr. Ford as clumsy and prone to falling. Mr. Ford's appearance demonstrated that he enjoyed a good laugh, even at his own expense. SNL continues to be a groundbreaking program.

JAMES E. PATTERSON
Washington, D.C.

INSURANCE NEEDS

Interesting article on the couple wondering if they should hold on to their whole life policies ["Stay Insured or Take the Cash?"]. I agree with the advice, but you left out one other option. There are companies that purchase life insurance policies, and in some cases, the insured will get more than the cash value from surrendering it. Might not be the right solution for everyone, but I felt it was worth a mention.

LAURIE J. BRENNAN
Malibu, California

GIVE ME STRENGTH

I just finished reading Jewel's story ["The A List"]. Talk about overcoming adversity! I've gone through hard times, too, such as an accident, the death of my mom and unemployment during COVID. Being mentally strong is just as important as being physically strong. (I like her suit too!)

Upfront The A List

5 Surprising Things About Taraji P. Henson

1 She started out at North Carolina A&T State University, intending to study electrical engineering, but dropped out

I just followed my smart friend there. Then I failed pre-calc. Pre-calc! With two tutors. I called my dad and cried, and he was, like, “Now enroll in drama at Howard University like you’re supposed to be doing.” And I did.

2 While at Howard, she worked as a secretary at the Pentagon and as a singing-dancing waitress on a cruise ship

I owed North Carolina A&T some money. My stepmom worked at the Pentagon and told me about the Stay-in-School employment program. And then my best friend at Howard was, like, “Girl, I’m a waitress on this dinner cruise and the tips are amazing.” So I did both, because I was always a little hustler. “Proud Mary” was my song.

3 In 2011, she posed without clothes in an antifur ad

I saw a documentary on HBO and was so disturbed. Then it was like kismet: A week later, PETA called me out of the blue to ask me to do this ad. Now I have one of the most incredible faux furs.

4 She spoke before the Congressional Black Caucus about mental illness

I had to share my secrets. But it’s freeing. Because then you’re not alone. I’m always looked at

“For you to think that of the billions on this planet, you’re the only one with mental health issues is fake news.”

as strong, and people see this cape, but I’m, like, “Y’all don’t understand what it’s like when I go home and I fall down to my knees and it feels like the walls are closing in.” Money doesn’t make your problems go away.

5 Her father, Boris, was bipolar

He would turn into a whole other person, from good to mean. Also, he would reenact being in the Vietnam War. I’ll never forget him jumping up thinking bombs were going off and making us crawl around on the floor. He had a lot of work to do. But you know what I love about my dad? He wore it on his sleeve. He didn’t hide that he had issues. And he got the healing that he needed. —As told to Joel Stein

*The Golden Globe-winning actress Taraji P. Henson, 54, will receive a 2024 honorary AARP Purpose Prize for founding and supporting the Boris Lawrence Henson Foundation, which is devoted to destigmatizing mental health issues within the Black community and supporting mental health treatments. ## Safer Than Jumper Cables

Restart a dead car battery with ease

REVIVING A dead battery used to mean having a pair of jumper cables on hand and finding a good Samaritan with another vehicle to jump-start your car. These days you can do it all on your own.

A rechargeable battery pack has enough juice to kick-start a car's battery by hooking it up to the terminals. They are available from several companies, including Gooloo, Scosche and Noco. These devices are about the size of a paperback book and start at around $100. Bonus: They often have connections that recharge a smartphone too.

You can also charge your battery from inside your car. Some chargers or adapters plug into a car's 12-volt outlet (formerly known as the cigarette lighter). It can be safer than popping the hood and standing outside. —John R. Quain

Can I Order Off the Kids' Menu?

This question has been making the social media rounds. For older people with diminishing appetites, the kids' menu might look like a tasty option

Adults Allowed

"IT SEEMS TO me that if customers are interested in lower-priced, smaller-portioned dishes that a restaurant already offers, they ought to be allowed to order those items, regardless of their age," says Brett Anderson, veteran food writer at The New York Times.

Many people agree. In a survey conducted earlier this year by OnePoll, 77 percent of respondents said adults should be allowed to order from the kids' menu. Twenty-one percent said they had done it.

Some major restaurant chains, such as Cracker Barrel, allow the practice, although you'll find that many other eateries and chains don't have a defined policy.

You're Kidding Yourself

A THIRD OF respondents in the OnePoll survey said they had been denied when trying to order off the kids' menu. Why? Kids' menu items are priced low because they aren't meant to be ordered as stand-alone products. Restaurants expect kids to be accompanied by adults who will order full-price entrées.

Don Caperton owns the Shack in Benton County, Tennessee, an area with a large population of retirees; more than 47 percent of residents within 20 minutes of his restaurant are 50 and older. Allowing adults to order from a kids' menu would hurt his bottom line. "Operating costs [such as labor, equipment usage, utilities and prep time] are not significantly reduced when preparing smaller portions," Caperton says. —Kevin Spain

STOP AND SHOP ... AND SHOP AND SHOP

Roadside stores now resemble suburban supercenters

THE FIRST TIME I visited a Buc-ee's, I felt like I'd walked into a retail carnival. Behold the jerky display. Feast your eyes on the fudge counter. Amaze yourself at the sandwich station. Explore the massive gift shop. Such is the trend in roadside stops, as travelers are eager to take a break from traffic to spend some time wandering miles of aisles or getting fresh-made food at chains including Wawa and Sheetz or truck stops Flying J or Love's. "What Buc-ee's and others have done," says Jeff Lenard, a vice president with industry trade group NACS, "is made the things you disliked about traveling—lengthening the time of a drive by having to stop to use the bathroom or get fuel—and changed the mindset to something you look forward to." —Chris Wadsworth

Let's Play It Again

Some of your favorite board games from years past have been reinvented for the 21st century

CLUE: ESCAPE

► This series blends the iconic mystery game with the escape room trend. Players set a timer, open the box and solve puzzles together. Several versions are available, each with a distinct name, such as The Midnight Hotel or The Illusionist's Club.

YAHTZEE FRENZY

► If you think Yahtzee is too slow, this is for you. Yahtzee Frenzy kicks the classic dice game up a notch. Instead of taking turns, players roll and score simultaneously, trying to be the fastest to roll the right results.

SPIES & LIES: A STRATEGO STORY

► Stratego is a chesslike game with pieces on a board. But in this version, players also use cards, placing them face down and going through rounds of guessing and bluffing in a complex battle of wits in addition to strategy.

JENGA MAKER

► This version upends the tower-toppling game. Jenga Maker puts players on teams. One member gets a card displaying a tower and must communicate to their teammates how to build the tower without sharing the card.

CONNECT 4 SPIN

► Players still try to get four of their color in a row, but instead of dropping discs, they insert them into a column. Then the player spins the entire plastic column around a horizontal bar. How it stops can change the board. —Marc Musso

HOW TO SPOT A REAL DEAL

Discount home stores promise low prices, but among the mix of high- and low-quality items, not everything is a bargain. What to know:

Lamps “Budget lamps look more expensive in muted colors and natural materials like wrought iron, wood, linen, glass or rattan,” says Vanessa Rhoades, author of Just Right!: Easy DIY Home Staging.

Rugs Count the knots or loops on the back of the rug. Decent rugs should have at least 150 knots per square inch, says Artem Kropovinsky, founder of Arsiteg, an interior design studio in New York City.

Storage baskets “Look for a metal frame, not a wire frame, which tends to become loose over time,” says interior designer Debbe Daley of Portsmouth, New Hampshire.

PUNK AT 50

A half-century ago, a sonic boom struck music and culture

THERE IS NO official start date for punk rock. No congress of spiky-haired musicians, adorned with safety pins, met to declare a revolution. But a strong, sneering case can be made that this form of rock started 50 years ago in, of all places, a country music bar.

The now-legendary CBGB—which stood for “country, bluegrass, blues”—opened in Manhattan’s seedy Bowery neighborhood in 1973. But by ’74, the struggling club was featuring rock acts—and became a scene populated with brash young musicians. The Ramones, considered the godfathers of punk, played their first CBGB gig in August of that year.

Here’s a look at punk’s impact. Hey, ho, let’s go!

FASHION > Technicolor hair, spiky cuts (like Billy Idol’s), skinny jeans, distressed clothing, Doc Martens boots: These are some of the hallmarks of punk fashion, which have been adopted by even the most popular singers. Consider Madonna, in cutoff T-shirts, ripped fishnet stockings and rubber bracelets. “Madonna was influenced by punk street culture,” says Susan Seidelman, who directed her in the 1985 film Desperately Seeking Susan.

The Ramones

Blondie

The Go-Go's

Bad Brains

Black Flag

Patti Smith

The Sex Pistols

The Clash

MUSIC > Others who emerged from that CBGB scene include Blondie, Talking Heads and Patti Smith Group. And punk spread to the U.K., as bands like the Sex Pistols, the Clash and the Damned shocked and stimulated the queen’s subjects. A second, more underground wave of punk hit in the 1980s, with groups like Black Flag (many Gen Xers have a tattoo of the band’s logo), the Misfits and Bad Brains. Some who started in punk became mainstream, like the Go-Go’s. John Doe of the Los Angeles band X points to ’90s hitmakers Green Day as evidence of punk’s lasting popularity: “They took it to the teenagers, which is what the Ramones, Blondie and everybody else wanted to do.”

Ewan McGregor

Kate McKinnon

Gary Oldman

MOVIES > Punk rock has been featured in major films, including Trainspotting (starring Ewan McGregor) and Sid & Nancy (Gary Oldman). Even one of the biggest hits of last year has a bit of punk breaking through the Day-Glo. In Greta Gerwig’s Oscar-nominated Barbie, Kate McKinnon’s Weird Barbie—with her quirky spirit, jagged hair and bizarre makeup—looks every bit a punk rock girl.

THEATER > Punk came to Broadway in 2010, with American Idiot, based on a Green Day album. “I was listening to the CD a lot, and I started to see a story form in my mind. I thought, Wow, that would be an amazing thing to do onstage,” says playwright-director Michael Mayer. The musical logged more than 400 shows, some featuring Green Day’s Billie Joe Armstrong himself.

Billie Joe Armstrong

SPORTS > Skateboarding and punk go together. Watch clips of Tony Hawk and you’ll likely hear SoCal punk by bands like Descendents or the Germs (with singer Darby Crash). But mainstream sports have also embraced punk anthems. “I played the Dead Milkmen’s ‘Punk Rock Girl’ at a Navy football game,” says stadium DJ Robert Popik, “and immediately received responses of praise.” —Craig Rosen

Provide Help From Afar

When someone needs aid with tech, you can access their device remotely

YOUR MOM calls and says, “My computer seems broken. When I press the keys, nothing happens.” Your dad calls and says, “I was watching a movie when the power went out. It’s back on now, but the screen says: ‘Your TV is not connected to the internet.’”

If you live nearby, you can hop in the car and assist. But what if your parent lives across the country?

Dozens of computer applications allow you to access devices in other people’s homes (with their permission).

Computer help On a PC, a remote application is part of the Windows operating system in versions 10 and 11. Each user—the one helping and the one needing help—presses these three keys: Ctrl, Windows (logo key) and Q. The Windows Quick Assist app will appear. It creates a code that the helper shares with the person needing assistance to get access to their computer.

If you use an Apple computer or a PC with an older version of Windows, there are many free apps available to provide remote access, including DWSservice, AnyDesk, Chrome Remote Desktop and TeamViewer.

TV help You can access another television through your smartphone using a unique service called JubileeTV. From afar, you can switch channels, adjust the volume and change other settings. The required $29 monthly subscription includes additional functions, such as video calling and the ability to send photos from phone to TV.

Phone help There are also apps that allow you to help others figure out their phones.

For Android phones, AirMirror includes screen mirroring, which lets you view the screen of another Android device from your phone, and remote control, which allows you to control another Android device. Other apps, such as TeamViewer and AirMore, can work between Android and Apple devices. —JD Sartain

ASK THE TECH GURU

My landline keeps getting more and more expensive, and I wouldn’t mind dropping it. But can I keep this number that I’ve had for decades?

AARP tech writer Edward C. Baig:

The good news is that you can likely keep that landline number and funnel those calls to your cellphone. Yes, many cellphones can work with two lines. The process is called porting.

STEP 1 | Make sure your cellphone can take two SIM cards or eSIMs. Those can accept calls to two different numbers on the same device. But you may incur charges.

STEP 2 | Call your cell carrier and tell them the landline number you want ported. Your landline provider might also charge you a fee to release the number.

STEP 3 | Cancel your landline.

WHEN VOICE NOTES BECOME ANNOYING

How to deal with monologues people send to your phone

HAVE YOU ever received a text message with no text?

Many people are giving up thumb typing in favor of recording voice messages in their text app. Many recipients find the practice irritating. We asked Lizzie Post, co-president of the Emily Post Institute, for her tips.

For the sender:

Consider context. If you’re driving and need to be hands-free, OK. If your message is too long for typing, maybe. But Post says voice notes shouldn’t be your go-to form of communication.

Give warning.

Text your friend that you’ll be sending a voice message and explain why.

For the receiver:

Express your concerns. “If something has started to veer into annoying usage, I think it’s OK for us to say something,” Post advises. “It’s also OK to let someone know that a particular form of communication doesn’t work for you.”

Kathy Bates

How she lost weight, gained confidence and found a perfect gig as the lead in a new 'Matlock' reboot

Make every day a success

I grew up in Memphis with older parents—my father was born in 1900—and I lived a very sheltered life. And my father asked me, because he was concerned that I wanted to play the guitar and sing and do all these artistic things, “Aren’t you going to make a success of yourself?” I was very young and said, “I just want to make every day a success. That’s as far as I can go.”

A professor’s best advice

I knew I could act when I was in high school. But at Southern Methodist University, I didn’t know what I was doing. At the orientation the speaker for the humanities school said, “You’re in the wrong school. You’re supposed to be in the art school. Go down the hall. Here’s where you’re going to begin your life’s work.”

Let Lady Luck lead you

SMU had just created a proper conservatory, and Bob Hope had given us a theater. So it was a magical time to be there. Then a friend I made there wrote a play, Vanities, which ran off-Broadway and gave me my start in theater. Warren Beatty came to see us and introduced me to Dustin Hoffman. Years later, [screenwriter] William Goldman came to see me in a different play. And they were casting Misery, so he recommended me to the director. But it all began at SMU.

Eating mindfully

Several years ago, I was diagnosed with diabetes. It scared the crap out of me. I was at 245 pounds. Over six years, I lost 80 pounds. I just started pushing my plate away, then I lost the last 20 pounds with Ozempic. I always joke that I lost a Romanian gymnast.

The freedom of losing weight

The confluence of getting the lead in Matlock and this new weight isn’t serendipity. Heavier, I wouldn’t have been able to withstand the long hours and the discipline of learning lines that a series requires. I can tuck in my shirts and close my jackets on set. I know it’s hackneyed, but for the first time in my life, I feel free of the sorrow and burden of being a woman who can’t move and breathe.

Using age positively

Women constantly fight ageism, and I’ve been very aware that the page has turned for many of us older folks. That’s why I was so drawn to this role of Maddie in Matlock: It was written for a woman my age. They created this magnificent character who is a driven, smart, funny, complicated older woman, so I can use all the things I’ve learned over the last 50 years in one character.

Tipping Points

You may have some strong opinions about tips, like if they should be taxed or whether they're out of control. But what do waiters, drivers and others who live on tips want to tell you about them? Here's what some had to say.

By KIMBERLY LANKFORD AND JULIE GOLDENBERG

Tour Guide

"Some tour companies will tell you that the tip is included. But that's not always accurate. There are too many instances where we don't get anything, and it's depressing given how much work and thought goes into our preparation."
—James Carr, president, Guild of Professional Tour Guides of Washington, D.C.

Food Delivery Driver

"The tip is displayed up front, and that's a big [factor in] whether or not drivers end up taking an order, because the base amount you get from DoorDash is not enough. Customers complain about the fees, but they don't go to the driver."
—Anonymous, St. Augustine, Florida

Rideshare Driver

"About 10 to 12 percent of all passengers tip. It's very low. But it all depends on the nature of the person. People who depend on tips—bartenders, strippers, housekeepers—always tip." —Sergio Avedian, senior contributor, The Rideshare Guy, Los Angeles

Server

"In most places, your tip doesn't go just to the server. Your server might have to pay 10 percent of their alcohol sales to the bartender and 10 percent of their total tips to the bussers. Many times, servers break even or lose money to tables that don't tip after ordering alcohol."
—Anonymous, Lynchburg, Virginia

Hotel Housekeeper

"Leave your tip every day. I may clean your room for two or three days in a row, but if you wait until check-out to tip and I'm not working that day, someone else gets the tip. Put it on the bed, or put it in an envelope and write 'Housekeeping' on it. But leave it in the room rather than taking it to the front desk."

—Maria Mata, W Hotel, San Francisco

Mover

"If you can't afford a tip, good reviews on websites such as Yelp, Google and Facebook are much appreciated. And although most movers just want to focus on getting the job done, offering food or drinks is always appreciated." —Vojin Popovic, Piece of Cake Moving and Storage, New York City

Nail Salon Technician

"Generally, about half a nail tech's income comes from tips. The technician usually receives only a percentage of the price of the service; the rest is paid back to the business. But the tip amount is 100 percent the nail tech's." —Rasheedah "Rah" Muhammad, "Confessions of a Nail Tech" blogger, Indian Land, South Carolina

MONEY REPORT

How I Saved $4,400 in a Day ... and (Maybe) You Can Too

Some simple negotiation tricks and a little time can go a long way toward keeping cash in your pocket BY DIANE HARRIS

HOW MUCH money could you save if you spent one full day trying? I recently decided to find out, tackling as many money-saving tasks as I could in a nine-to-five workday—all the pesky stuff I kept meaning to do but never made time for.

The result for me: eye-popping savings, on an annualized basis, of precisely $4,466.41.

Along the way, I learned some seriously valuable lessons. For one, it's easy to get a deal on almost everything; the real challenge is how big a price cut you can nab. Also, there's a simple formula to achieve the biggest savings. Finally, the benefits of this exercise go far beyond dollars and cents.

Here's what I did—and how you can do it too.

Go for the easy wins first.

I spent the first hour of the day identifying my recurring bills and determining which ones to cut or renegotiate. This step revealed two streaming services I'd forgotten I had, a handful of subscriptions to magazines I rarely read and a mystery monthly charge from Apple. All told, I was spending about $100 more a month on these services than I'd guessed.

I'm hardly alone. Consumers, on average, estimate they spend $86 a month on subscription services, while their actual outlay is $219 a month, reports C+R Research.

Armed with my checklist, I started with the most straightforward task: canceling subscriptions. A pattern became apparent: I'd click to cancel, then get a reminder of how great the service was; click to cancel again, then get an offer with modest savings; click to cancel a third time and get a much better deal.

"The company's goal is to get you to stay on as a customer while giving away as little as possible, so they will never offer their best deal first," says Yahya Mokhtarzada, cofounder of Rocket Money, a budgeting app that helps track and cancel recurring charges.

Although this was a useful strategy to learn—hold out as long as possible!—I ignored the enticements and clicked goodbye in quick succession to five magazines and the forgotten streaming services. Then, scrolling through my phone, I figured out that the mystery Apple charge was for an app I no longer use. So I dropped that too.

Time spent: 2 hours, 10 minutes
Savings: $1,078.53 per year

Deal with a human.

To get the best offers, pros had told me, you must talk to a person. So for services I wanted to keep, I hit the phone. →

MoneySaver

I followed this basic script: “Say you want to cancel your service. That will get you to the retention department, where they have more liberty than a regular customer service rep to give you as much as you can squeeze out of them,” says Barry Gross, president of BillCutterz, a subscription-negotiating service. “Keep your questions open-ended, like, ‘What can you do to help me reduce my bill?’ and keep asking, ‘What else can you do for me?’”

First up was my $498.88-a-year Wall Street Journal digital subscription. The rep quickly offered what seemed like a sweet deal: a three-year plan for $99 for the first year, then $299 and $467 for subsequent years. I took it. That was a rookie mistake. If I had checked the WSJ website, I would have seen a new-customer offer for $52 a year. Knowing that, I could have asked for the same price.

Resolving to do better, I checked the New York Times website before calling them. So when a rep offered to reduce my $51-a-month charge for digital access and the Sunday print edition to $25.52 a month for six months, I mentioned a new-customer promotion I’d seen: $20 a month for a year. The rep countered with $12.40 a month for six months, then $24.80 for the following six months. Score!
Time spent: 40 minutes
Savings: $788.68

Save the thorniest bills for last.

Getting a price cut on cellphone service is tough, typically. “They keep you on the phone for a long time to wear you down and overload you with confusing details about different plan options that often don’t offer any real savings,” says Mokhtarzada.

That matched my experience with Brenda, a cheery Verizon agent who said she’d be happy to help lower my bill. She offered me—“don’t laugh,” she said—$4 off my $234-a-month family plan as a reward for my 20 years as a loyal Verizon customer.

Harris, pictured here, says you can cut a lot of bills in one day.

I laughed anyway. “What else can you do for me, Brenda?” I asked.

She then bombarded me with features of plans I could switch to, none of which would cut my bill more than a dollar or so. “I don’t need those features,” I said. “I just want to save money.” This went on for an hour until an exasperated Brenda asked, “How much do you need to save?” At least $50 a month, I said. Then she magically found a new basic plan, which, along with dropping a hot spot on two lines and insurance on another, cut my monthly bill by $51.

Later I learned I’d made another rookie mistake. “Typically you can get the discount without giving up anything in terms of service,” says Mokhtarzada.

The last item on my agenda took the most time but yielded the biggest savings: applying to have my Medicare premiums adjusted due to a “life-changing event.” For me, that event was my recent move from a staff job as deputy editor of Newsweek to freelance writing and editing work that pays far less. Since my Medicare premiums are based on the income reported on my tax return from two years ago, my husband and I are paying $1,987.20 per year more than we should pay, based on my current income. So I filled out an application for the adjustment, then uploaded it with the necessary documentation.

Time spent: 3 hours, 37 minutes
Savings: $2,599.20

Keep the momentum going.

The most delightful part of my day wasn’t how much cash I put in my pocket. It was how exhilarated I felt and motivated I was to keep the game going. On my next money-saving day, I’ll tackle my cable and internet bundle and my homeowners insurance.

“There’s very little downside to trying; at worst, you’ll break even,” says LendingTree’s Matt Schulz, author of Ask Questions, Save Money, Make More. At best, like me, your savings may run into the thousands. Not bad for a day’s work. ■

First Came Health Crises, Then the Debt

A woman struggles to recover from a series of personal setbacks

THE PROBLEM

Yvette Aviles had strong finances: a home she owned, a growing salary and retirement savings on the rise. Five years ago, all that changed. Aviles, a human resources manager in Teaneck, New Jersey, took time off to recover from foot surgery and help her father, diagnosed with Parkinson's. On top of a pay cut when she returned to work was her own back surgery, plus home and car repairs. She tapped a $50,000 home equity line of credit (HELOC), then ran up $110,000 in credit card debt. Even after getting a higher-paying job, she struggled, raiding her IRA with early withdrawals. "I've always been the person who lent other people money," Aviles, 57 and single, told me through tears. "I've been living under severe stress."

Yvette Aviles was overwhelmed by her bills.

THE ADVICE

Some debt problems can be solved by reining in spending and funneling the excess into a pay-down strategy. Balance transfer credit cards with a 0 percent introductory rate can also help. Neither worked for Aviles. Just making minimum payments on her cards was untenable, with their interest rates as high as 32 percent. And the 3 to 5 percent fee for balance transfers felt too expensive.

Another option was to file for bankruptcy. "Hard pass," Aviles said. She could also work with a debt settlement firm. Under such a plan, you stop paying creditors, save up for a lump-sum payment, and offer to pay only part of what you owe in the hope that creditors will accept that. But your credit score tanks, creditors may refuse to settle, the industry is prone to scams, and the IRS treats forgiven debt as taxable income.

Not-for-profit credit counselors offer what's called a debt management plan (DMP). These are arrangements with credit card companies to lower interest rates and waive late and over-limit fees. You pay counselors, they pass the money along to your creditors, and your cards are closed. It typically takes several years to get through a DMP successfully.

Aviles chose the DMP. I connected her with Marla Puckett, a credit counselor with 21 years of experience who works at the nonprofit Money Management International (MMI). Puckett started by gathering enough information on Aviles' living expenses, income and debts to confirm that at reduced interest rates, she would be able to make payments on an ongoing basis. The verdict: On a five-year plan, she could do it. MMI's DMP required a $25 setup fee and an ongoing $59 monthly charge, but it would reduce Aviles' monthly credit card payments from $3,300 (her total minimum) to about $2,100.

But Aviles still had no reserves for home maintenance and future emergencies. So we took a hard look at her house. She owed $97,000, plus the $50,000 HELOC, on a home that a local broker, Steven Finkelstein of Russo Real Estate, estimated would sell for at least $420,000. After commissions, closing costs and moving, Aviles could clear about $240,000. Excluding maintenance and upkeep, carrying the property was costing her a little over $2,100 a month. For roughly the same amount, she could rent an apartment. Would she consider selling and using the equity to pay off the debt, replenish her emergency fund and give herself a fresh start?

THE OUTCOME

Aviles signed the DMP and began making the reduced payments. She also got ready to list her house with Finkelstein and asked him to find her an apartment. "I love being in a house," she says. But citing the repairs and upkeep, she adds, "I think not having the burden is the thing I'll enjoy most." ■

GETTING YOUR Z'S AWAKE AT 3 A.M. AGAIN?

Even good sleepers can start experiencing insomnia in their 50s. Here's expert advice on how to cope

Cut the booze

Alcohol "lingers longer in our system when we're 50," says Alicia Roth, a psychologist at the Cleveland Clinic Sleep Disorders Center. Even if a nightcap helps you get to sleep, it could wake you up later, because alcohol can suppress deep sleep.

Get tested for apnea

For women, obstructive sleep apnea often emerges in perimenopause, says Brandon Peters, M.D., a neurologist in Seattle specializing in sleep disorders. Symptoms include snoring and waking up gasping.

Schedule worry

Sandwich-generation stressors can wake you up, says Cathy Goldstein, M.D., a sleep medicine physician at the Michigan Medicine Sleep Disorders Center. She suggests a "wind-down" in a separate room to get worries out of your system.

Roll with it

Older bodies require less sleep, says Chris Winter, M.D., author of The Sleep Solution: Why Your Sleep Is Broken and How to Fix It. If you've lain awake for 20 minutes, go do something quiet in dim light. Then try again. —Eric Slightznagel

SHOP CULTURE

MEET THE NEW MALL

SHOPPING MALLS were the place to eat, shop and stare at big hair in the '80s—and Gen Xers miss them. In a recent survey, 66 percent said they wished traditional shopping malls would make a comeback (just 54 percent of boomers said the same). Of course, malls haven't all gone away, they're just different. Here's what's trending.

IN:

OUT:

- ✓ Indoor sports Retailers are luring visitors with physical activities including yoga, pickleball, ice-skating and virtual golf.
- ✓ Play areas The Springfield Town Center mall in Virginia recently opened a 32,000-square-foot Lego Discovery Center (above) with playrooms and a Lego world built out of 1.5 million bricks.
- ✓ Pop-up stores They're not just for Halloween costumes and calendars anymore.

- ✗ Arcades Home video consoles drove them to extinction.
- ✗ Fountains Most shopping centers eliminated water features to reduce costs. (Who still carries pennies to make a wish, anyway?)
- ✗ Old standbys Familiar retail chains like Kinney Shoes, Merry-Go-Round, Sam Goody and Wicks 'N' Sticks are long gone.

Q: What advice would you give to your younger self?

A: Don't get too high on the highs or too low on the lows. This is a marathon, not a footrace. It's got to be about doing stuff that you're happy with.

Tips for Dealing With Truculent Teens

Keeping the communication lines open when your once-sweet kiddo turns tough

IT WAS NEARLY 20 years ago, but Kim Muench, 56, remembers the moment clearly. Her teenage son, angry about his curfew, walked into the laundry room and called her a bitch. Muench was stunned and devastated—her oldest had never acted like that before. (Ten minutes later, he came back to apologize.)

Now a certified parent coach near Dallas and a mother of five with one teen still at home, Muench knows not to take such adolescent outbursts personally. “A lot of times, it’s not really about you,” she says. “They’re struggling with their own emotional lives.”

But it’s not always easy to stay zen when your kid is raging. Who likes getting yelled at for “breathing weird”? Developmental experts offer some simple strategies for weathering your teen’s stormy moods with your relationship intact—and even strengthened.

Use “the Botox brow.” Teens aren’t always able to correctly identify facial expressions, research has shown. If yours is fretting about a bad grade, they might interpret your crinkled forehead as a sign of anger rather than sympathy, says Michelle Icard, author of 8 Setbacks That Can Make a Child a Success. Icard counsels parents to be “extraordinarily neutral looking”—as if you’ve received a heavy dose of Botox—when speaking with an upset teen. “They feel safe then to tell you more.”

Take a back seat. When your teen has an idea that you know won’t go anywhere, don’t immediately shoot it down, says Zachary Feldman, M.D., associate psychiatry professor at the University of North Carolina School of Medicine. Ask open-ended questions. “Sometimes they just want to talk,” he says.

Suggest a try-this-first list. Encourage your kid to write down 10 things that make them happy, such as shooting hoops or watching dog videos, Icard advises. Then, when they come to you worked up about friendship drama, suggest they try something on their list for 20 minutes, then return to see if they still feel the same way. Time focused on a favorite activity can stop spiraling feelings and build self-awareness. “It’s a lesson in, ‘When I feel discomfort, I can do something to make myself feel better,’” says Icard.

Schedule a weekly check-in. Teens are insanely busy. Sitting down with them once a week to discuss activities and schedule homework sessions can head off last-minute crises and meltdowns, says Ana Homayoun, author of Erasing the Finish Line: The New Blueprint for Success Beyond Grades and College Admission. “You’re not micromanaging the process, but you’re creating a time and space for the process to happen,” she says.

Let them stay in their room. As a teen does the hard work of separating themselves from their parents, their bedroom becomes a place to express their independence and regroup. As long as your kid is putting in the effort at school and engaging with family and friends, it’s fine to let them spend time off by themselves, says Stephen P. Whiteside, a child psychologist at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota. (Note: If you see your child retreating from school, family and other aspects of life, it might be time to call in their pediatrician for a mental health assessment.)

Turn the other cheek. Thinking back to that laundry-room moment, Muench is thankful her son apologized. If you’re in a similar situation but your child doesn’t return, she advises taking some time to let your kid cool off and then going to talk to them. “It’s not about ‘You were disrespectful to me,’” she says. “It’s about ‘What’s going on? This is really out of character for you.’ Instead of being offended, be curious.” —Sarah Lindenfeld Hall

Forget FOMO. Try JOMO

REMEMBER THE fear of missing out, the sensation that someone, somewhere, was having more fun than you? Meet the joy of missing out, a.k.a. JOMO. You feel it every time you're relieved when your social plans fall through.

"JOMO is crucial as you reach your 50s," says psychologist Tali Gazit. "It's about consciously choosing how to spend your time and energy." Here's how you can boost your JOMO.

Rock Concert Conundrum

What it is: The show won't end till midnight!
What to do: There's no shame in leaving before it's over. In your 50s, losing sleep can put you at risk of a variety of chronic conditions, including diabetes and high blood pressure.

Party Overload

What it is: You're invited to a huge event. You'd rather stay home in your pj's.
What to do: Unless it's a party to celebrate a significant milestone for a close friend or family member, it's OK to send your regrets. Social connections are very important to your health, but there is such a thing as overdoing it, says Chris Barry, a psychology professor at Washington State University.

The Facebook Blahs

What it is: Social media leaves you depleted.
What to do: Limit your exposure. Try setting a time limit of 30 minutes per day for checking on your friends' enviable (or at least enviable-looking) lives. Such a limit can reduce anxiety and depression. —Eric Spitznagel

My FIRST TIME ... HEARING MY CLOTHES CALLED 'VINTAGE'

DURING A CLOSET purge of clothes that, at 54, I wasn't ever going to be young or thin enough to wear again, I decided to sell some dresses on consignment. As a TV writer, I'd amassed designer gowns for various black-tie events. Once a friend who was shopping with me for an Emmy dress asked the saleswoman, "Don't you have anything fabulous in the back?"—and she reappeared with a couture Christian Lacroix strapless, hand-beaded gown that had only just been delivered to the store. Sold!

That Christian Lacroix and several other silky treasures were in the body-sized bag I unzipped at the shop. The clerk took one quick look and said, "We don't take vintage."

Excuse me? I thought, I bought these new! And not that long ago!

But then I did the math. "Not that long ago" turned out to be about 25 years. I sheepishly took my treasures home and stuck them back in the closet.

Then one day recently, I found my preteen daughter and her friend twirling in front of a mirror in two of my gowns, cinched in to fit with hair clamps. I recognized the feeling. In those dresses, I had always felt a little like a princess playing dress-up. But I also realized that those frocks are badges of honor—proof that my work and I were worth splurging on and celebrating. Sure, they may be "vintage," but the dresses represent pride in a job well done, a pride I was able to share with my child. That kind of opportunity never goes out of style.

WHAT IT IS: A scalpel or an instrument similar to an electric shaver that scrapes the skin to remove dead cells, sun-damaged skin and “peach fuzz”

HOW LONG IT LASTS:

Three to four weeks

PROS: Noninvasive. Brighter and smoother skin can be seen immediately.

CONS: May take a few sessions to see a reduction in dark spots and other signs of aging.

AVERAGE COST: $100–$200 per session

LASER RESURFACING

WHAT IT IS: A controlled laser injury that smooths and plumps the skin by triggering the body's natural healing process

HOW LONG IT LASTS:

Three to five years

PROS: Can reduce acne and improve skin texture

CONS: May cause redness, sensitivity, flaking and peeling. May not be safe for people with darker skin tones.

AVERAGE COST: $500–$2,500

CHEMICAL PEELS

WHAT IT IS: Chemical exfoliant applied to break down dead skin cells and reveal fresher skin

HOW LONG IT LASTS:

Months to years (the deeper the peel, the longer it tends to last)

PROS: Can reveal a brighter complexion and address acne, aging and uneven skin tone

CONS: Burning, redness and sensitivity may occur.

AVERAGE COST: $150–$800

RADIO FREQUENCY

WHAT IT IS: Electromagnetic radiation delivered to the dermal layer to stimulate collagen production and tighten the skin

HOW LONG IT LASTS: One to three years

PROS: Can reduce fine lines and wrinkles

CONS: May not be suitable for people with darker skin tones, as it can cause damage. Skin burning can also occur.

AVERAGE COST: $1,000–$4,000

PLATELET-RICH PLASMA INJECTION

WHAT IT IS: Also known as a “vampire facial.” Plasma from the patient's own blood is injected into the face to accelerate skin healing and boost the production of collagen.

HOW LONG IT LASTS: One to two years

PROS: Can smooth and plump skin and reduce acne scarring

CONS: Requires drawing blood

AVERAGE COST: $500–$2,500

Samuel L. Jackson's Next Act

The superstar actor riffs on staying busy, becoming Gabonese, the art of quiet giving—and being forced to do stupid s---

By Carvell Wallace

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JOE PUGLIESE

ON A QUIET morning in a conference room on Hollywood Boulevard, I await the arrival of Samuel L. Jackson. It is a little like waiting for the president of the United States; someone from an advance team announces his imminent arrival, as though Air Force One is touching down. When he sweeps into the room—tall and magnetic, with a confident walk and resplendent in a satiny blue Adidas tracksuit, a white T-shirt and a bright red bucket hat—he seems to change the quality of the air by his presence.

He and I, two Black men, are meeting up for a work engagement today, on Juneteenth, the irony of which does not escape us. “I’m supposed to be somewhere barbecuing,” he chides me in mock accusation. I try to deflect. “Hey, listen, I didn’t choose this date!” which, of course, is true. With celebrities of his stature, you sort of take the dates their teams offer. “Yes, you did, you wanted this,” he teases me, deadpan.

And it was here that I understood one thing about Samuel L. Jackson. If he makes a joke, it’s because it’s something that maybe needs saying. In other words, he’s a little impish.

Indeed, some of Jackson’s best work is arranged around this very specific quality of messing with you, making you wonder how serious he is and what exactly he’s serious about. Consider his standout performance as the wry but murderous hit man Jules Winnfield in 1994’s Pulp Fiction who baffles would-be victims with a series of non sequiturs and a Bible verse before committing the awful deed. Or as the sinister arms dealer Ordell Robbie in Quentin Tarantino’s follow-up, Jackie Brown, whose affable but subtly mendacious smooth talking to his supposed friend, the thief Beaumont Livingston, right before he kills him goes down as one of the more chilling setups in cinema history.

In fact, there are very few actors who can titrate the qualities of menace and charisma the way Jackson can. In his latest projects, the playwright August Wilson's The Piano Lesson on Netflix and the Peacock limited series Fight Night: The Million Dollar Heist, he leverages this quality to reach two stellar but quite opposite performances. In The Piano Lesson, he reprises the role of the quiet patriarch Doaker, a part he played in the Broadway production two years ago, directed by his wife of 44 years, LaTanya Richardson Jackson.

In Fight Night, Jackson plays real-life underworld boss Frank Moten, who leads with menace, but you never quite know when or where it's coming from. Sporting a small Afro streaked with gray and a pair of throwback '70s glasses (has any performer made better use of the hair and wardrobe department than Jackson?), Moten threatens with a steady ease that makes us feel the existential dread with which Kevin Hart's fast-talking protagonist—a small-time hustler who gets in way over his head—must contend.

Jackson's oeuvre is as varied as the hairstyles he's sported in his films. He's worked with great directors—Tarantino, Martin Scorsese, Steven Soderbergh, George Lucas, Milos Forman, Paul Thomas Anderson, to name a few—and has held his own on-screen with such prominent actors as Dustin Hoffman, Joe Pesci, Geena Davis, Leonardo DiCaprio, Ossie Davis, Ruby Dee and Jeff Goldblum.

But he has little shame about doing what might generously be called lighter fare. His list of one-star movies is longer than most actors' entire IMDb pages. He famously agreed to do Snakes on a Plane because he liked the title. It could be said that he picks scripts like a 10-year-old picking out candy at the concessions counter, with joy, abandon and, I can't help notice, a fair bit of gratitude.

I N SEGREGATED Chattanooga, Tennessee, Jackson was the son of a factory worker and quickly learned the rules of the world. He knew that there were people who meant him harm because of the color of his skin, and he adapted both his razor-sharp wit and constant vigilance accordingly. He got interested in acting in the middle grades and, around the same time, learned that his soon-to-be trademark utterance, “motherf---er,” actually helped him ease his embarrassing stutter. Jackson attended Morehouse College, where he quickly joined a group of student radicals, who in 1969 held members of the board of trustees captive, leading to a 29-hour siege. Jackson was expelled for two years, but his fate was redirected when the FBI told his mother that her child was mixed up in some heavy stuff and that if she wanted him to live, she had to get him out of Atlanta. Jackson was summarily shipped off to live with relatives in Los Angeles.

When the acting bug bit him, he relocated to New York City, where he fell in with other ambitious Black actors, including his future wife, Denzel Washington and Laurence Fishburne. Jackson's career

Samuel L. Jackson's 15 Most Iconic Roles

Goodfellas (1990) Oversleep on Martin Scorsese's mobbed-up mean streets and it could cost you your life. RIP, Stacks.

Jungle Fever (1991) Jackson's big breakout at 42, courtesy of Spike Lee; wins best supporting actor at Cannes. Next stop, stardom.

Jurassic Park (1993) The chain-smoking brainiac engineer at the deadly dino-themed park. “Hold on to your butts.”

stalled when his drug and alcohol use reached a fever pitch, and in 1990, he found himself, at 42 years old, shipped off once again, this time to a rehab facility in upstate New York. He hasn’t looked back: His first role upon leaving rehab was as the crack-addicted Gator in Spike Lee’s film Jungle Fever, a performance impactful enough that the Cannes Film Festival revived the best supporting actor award just to give it to him.

From there the kid from Chattanooga, simply put, went on to become the highest-grossing leading man in movie history. [See “15 Most Iconic Roles,” page 32 .] His credits, remarkably, number north of 250, and his movies are responsible for a staggering $28 billion at the box office worldwide, not to mention a BAFTA, an honorary Academy Award and Tony and Emmy nods. Now 75 years old, the man is still youthful and spry, gracious and quick-witted, kept in shape by a strict diet and a regimen of golf, Pilates and acupuncture. His activism has morphed into the quieter type, and he is generous with his good fortune (he and his wife donated $5 million to refurbish the fine arts building at Spelman College, for example; she is an alumna) but prefers to keep most of his generosity behind the scenes. I settle into a conversation with Jackson about his latest projects, his experiences with aging, his long marriage and exactly how he manages to stay so energetic.

Q. Fewer and fewer people are alive who experienced segregation firsthand. What was that like?

It was a village. I could go to different places in town and be safe because people knew who I was. And when we looked at the dominant culture, we knew how they felt about us, and they knew how we felt about them. And they were safer with us than we were with them.

When I was going to school, teachers often came to your house, so that they’d know where you came from. And they knew I had to go to college. That was the expectation.

When other kids were diagramming sentences, I was reading literature, because they knew I could diagram a sentence. I knew what a subject and a predicate were and all that other stuff. Or when I was in a math class, and the other kids were doing simple division, I was doing something else because the teachers knew I knew it. They protected us, and they gave us the information we needed to go into the world. They gave us our history too. Though I already knew what slavery was, and how it was, because my grandmother was one generation removed from slavery. Her mom was a slave. So when she talked to me about slavery and white people, it was painted with another kind of brush.

Q. Tell me more about her.

She worked for white people. She was raising white people’s kids, and they used to give me like a gift on Christmas, or some s---, you know? One year, I didn’t write a thank-you card fast enough, and they asked for one. They said, “Pearl, did Sam get that gift we gave?”

She’s like, “Yes, he did.”

“Well, I ain’t got no thank-you card. You all raising that boy right?”

She took her apron off, left and never went back to work. They came by the house every weekend for almost a year saying, “Pearl, we’re so sorry, please come back.” She didn’t look at them and never went back to work. My grandfather told her she didn’t have to work no more, and she didn’t.

So segregation, for me, is painted in those lessons that I got from my grandmother and my grandfather, how to survive in a world that was very, very dangerous—for insignificant offenses.

Q. You’re a citizen of Gabon. How did that come about?

When we were doing the documentary Enslaved about the ships that didn’t make it, my genetic ancestry came back as being Gabonese, and then my tribal destination came up. I went back to Gabon, and they had a whole initiation ceremony into the tribe, and they gave me a passport.

Q. How was that for you?

It was moving. I guess you don’t know what survivor’s remorse is

Pulp Fiction (1994)

Three things about Jules Winnfield: likes tasty burgers, has strong opinions on foot massages, cites Ezekiel.

Die Hard With a Vengeance (1995)

Sometimes even John McClane needs a partner, but that partner doesn’t have to be happy about it.

A Time to Kill (1996)

“Yes, they deserve to die and I hope they burn in hell!” The defense rests.

Eve’s Bayou (1997)

Kasi Lemmon’s Southern Gothic lets Jackson be very good at being a very bad doctor.

until you're standing where the slave ships had been sitting in the ocean just looking at the horizon. But it was crazy, too, because I met the chief of the Benga tribe, and he looked just like my best friend from New York. I looked down and I saw girls that I'd had relationships with from high school or wherever, and I saw me in different places. So it's a deep thing to find out that you belong somewhere.

Q. You mention survivor's remorse. I was thinking about sobriety and what it means to turn your life around—to basically be living what feels like a second life. Talk a little bit about that decision to make a change in your life and what of that you carry with you today.

I was tired. I was whipped, because of that first time I appeared in Piano Lesson, in 1990. I was Charles Dutton's understudy. I had to go to work every night and listen to him do the role that I had originated at Yale Repertory Theater in 1987, and it was making me crazy.

I don't know about deciding to get sober, because I was trying to get high. My wife and daughter found me lying on the floor. My best friend from high school was a drug counselor and my wife called him, and I was in rehab the next day. I didn't go kicking and screaming because I was tired.

I had a very palpable life change because of it. I played Gator, and then Whoopi Goldberg talked these people into creating this award at the Cannes Film Festival—best supporting actor—for the performance.

And then I got the call, because I always said I was never coming to Hollywood until they called me, and I got the call, and I ended up doing White Sands. I got another call to come to Hollywood and meet Harrison Ford and see if he was cool, and I did Patriot Games and then got a three-picture deal at Morgan Creek. Another two-picture deal at Paramount, and then Pulp Fiction. So my life changed significantly when I got clean.

In my mind, if I pick drugs and alcohol up, all this is going away. Because that's what kept me from getting here in the first place. I started to realize, like, Yeah, maybe your eyes were a little too red when you went to that audition. Maybe you did smell like beer, you know? When you were smoking that weed on your way to the audition, got in there and thought you turned it out, maybe you didn't.

So I pray every day—I roll out of bed and get on my knees before I do anything else: “God, keep the desire to drink and drug from me this day.” That's all I need to say about that.

Q. You've had a few second and third chances—I'm thinking of what happened at Morehouse. How do you experience and express gratitude around that?

I have a different understanding of what my obligation is now. Why was I spared? Why was I given the opportunity to go from that to this? A lot of the things that LaTanya and

I contribute to, or I support in other ways, are opportunities for people to get second chances like that.

Like our support of the Children's Defense Fund—understanding that service is part of what we're here for and whatever that saying is, “people that have, they have to give back.” I don't know if people have to, because some people don't get it, you know. But I'm glad to be able to do it.

I know a lot of people think I'm volatile. I guess I am. But I have a great compassion for the people that I see who are less fortunate, and that's not just Black people. It's everybody.

Q. This character of Doaker in The Piano Lesson was so interesting to me. You always want him to do more than he does. How did you come to understand his motivations? How did you make sense of him and his choices?

He's like my grandfather. I was the only child in a house with three women—my mom, my grandmother and my aunt. My grandfather just didn't intervene because he knew he wasn't going to win. He let things play out. And when they got through with me, my grandfather would sit me down and tell me, “You know, look, do this, do that.” [Doaker] says something about that very same thing, about not engaging when people are raising a kid.

Q. You also have Fight Night: The Million-Dollar Heist coming out soon. Talk a little bit about what it was like to work with another all-star cast.

They're good people. I watched Empire a couple of seasons, so I know what Terrence [Howard] and Taraji

Jackie Brown (1997) Jackson soars in his post-Pulp reunion with Quentin Tarantino. Love the long hair. Wait, did he just shoot Robert De Niro?!

Deep Blue Sea (1999) Ladies and gents, I give you the most unexpected (and most enjoyable) death scene in shark movie history.

Star Wars (1999-2005) Mace Windu—hands down, the coolest member of the Jedi High Council.

Unbreakable (2000) This may be M. Night Shyamalan's best, with Jackson as the very breakable villain.

Jackson appeared in The Piano Lesson on Broadway and in film.

[Henson's] kind of chemistry or energy was. [For more on Henson, see page 7.] I watched Kevin's rise. But one of the first things I said to Kevin when we had the initial conversation about what was going on in Fight Night, I said, "Every time you see me, you got to think I'm going to kill you."

Q. It's going to be tense.

So let's get tense with it. And he bought in from the beginning. I did have to let go of some things to make the work OK, because, you know, I don't do stupid s--- in movies, but they had me doing stupid s--- sometimes.

Q. Like what?

You know, I kill people in front of people that aren't my people. Smart gangsters don't do that. But OK, I said, "This is what you all want me to do, right? I'm just going to get right in my mind to do it." And I made it work.

Q. Do you feel old for your age, young for your age?

I pay no attention to that. I mean, I do pay attention to my body because I've had things happen to it. I have to work at being flexible and sustaining myself, making sure I'm upright and not kind of bent, you know? So I have to think about those things, and I work on them.

Q. What kind of stuff do you do?

I use Pilates on a mat with exercise bands and a Pilates reformer machine. I watch my diet; I haven't had beef since October. I shot a movie in Montana and didn't have a steak.

Q. That's a feat. Do you miss it?

No, not at all. Way back in the '60s, me and my wife decided we won't eat pork. I was like, OK, fine. She used to tell my daughter that she was allergic to pork. Then my daughter left home, and when she got to college, she's like, "I ate some bacon and nothing happened."

Q. And you've been married to LaTanya for 44 years. How have you kept it going?

A lot of tolerance, because everybody's got flaws, and not giving up when it would be easy to give up. I've done s--- in my marriage that's crazy, you know? She has, too, in her head, or whatever in reality, but you got to go, "Is that a breakup offense?" Or is it just that we need to spend a little time together and get some understanding about it?

Or there are certain things that you learn to ignore about people—that she's learned to ignore about me.

And one of the things she had to accept is that I'm going to go to work. I'm going to go to work all the time until, you know, it's time. ■

When the blockbuster TV miniseries Roots premiered in 1977, it fueled an explosion in genealogy research. Decades later, that interest has only grown, powered by easy DNA tests, access to online records and shows like Finding Your Roots on PBS (AARP is a sponsor). The global genealogy services and products market was valued at $5.4 billion in 2023, and it'll reach $15.8 billion by 2033, according to market research firm Fact.MR.

That includes spending on travel, an ancestry industry in itself. Numerous tour companies cater to that hunger to visit the homeland—planning the logistics, conducting research, even helping track down relatives.

For many Americans, visiting their native lands is not only an emotional quest but a logical step in their family-tree research. They want to learn what they can't at home, walk where their ancestors walked and meet relatives they never knew existed. Here are three travelers who did just that.

His grandparents left Okinawa for Hawai‘i in 1906.

GENEALOGY BEGAN to interest me in 2022. I started looking up information on my grandparents in Hawai‘i, building my family tree and collecting documents.

In April 2024, I traveled to Japan on an Ancestry/Kensington Tours’ Personal Heritage Journey with a genealogist, Yuzo Ochiai. We walked through my maternal grandmother’s city of Itoman with a photo of a dental office and a prewar address we thought might be connected to my family. The building was gone.

We entered a hardware store and shared our information. The owner pulled up a map and said, “Go to this address and somebody should be able to help you.” No one was home, but three women came out from across the street. One of their husbands called a man who used to live there and told him, “I’ve got a genealogist with a guy from Oregon who thinks he’s related to you.” When we met, his sister was there too. We discovered that their dad and my mom are first cousins.

I had a picture of two parents and two young children. The back of the photo said the baby was named Junko. “That’s me!” the sister said. It was surreal: A few hours before, she was at home, minding her own business, and then she’s meeting a relative. It was like a reality show.

I didn’t consider how meeting my distant relatives would impact them. They bombarded me with questions. Even when the genealogist wasn’t available to interpret, we communicated and joked by pointing. It was like being with my cousins in Hawai‘i.

Tips for Planning a Successful Genealogy Trip

TO LEARN FAMILY HISTORY

► Create a family tree. You can find free templates online from sources such as the National Genealogical Society (nsgenealogy.org) and the National Archives (archives.gov). Senior Planet from AARP also offers genealogy courses. Go to seniorplanet.org.

► Interview relatives. The best starting point for learning family history is, yes, your family. Get info from parents, cousins, siblings and even family friends. Focus on four key items: names, dates, places and relationships.

► Sift through closets. Useful sources of information are lurking in your home, including family Bibles, newspaper clippings, military certificates, birth and death certificates, marriage licenses, naturalization certificates, diaries, letters, baby books and other documents, the National Archives suggests.

► Take a genetic test. To really learn your origins, test your DNA through companies such as AncestryDNA, 23andMe or FamilyTreeDNA. The results are accurate and sometimes surprising.

► Start digging. Top research options include Ancestry.com, FamilySearch.org, the National Archives and the Ellis Island Passenger Search database (heritage.statueofliberty.org/passenger).

WHEN TRAVELING ABROAD

► Consider a tour company. Those that specialize in genealogy trips, such as African Ancestry, Family Tree Tours and Kensington Tours, will not only book your hotel and manage your transportation but will also provide genealogical research. Debra Wolfe [page 39] says that Family Tree Tours found some ancestral homes in Germany that “I would not have found on my own.”

► Bring photos. Meeting a relative? Bring family photos and a copy of your family tree (both to share and fill in the blanks). Family members are often as interested in you as you are in them.

○ MY KIDS GAVE me an African Ancestry DNA test for a Christmas present in 2022. It showed that I’m from the Temne people in Sierra Leone. I was so excited, and in April 2023, I took a two-week tour with African Ancestry. Twelve of us were in the group: Some were Temne; others were from the Mende people.

The trip was profound. Sometimes I was in awe; sometimes I was in tears. We held a memorial on the shores of Bunce Island, where ships brought in and shipped out slaves. We dressed in white and stood in silence. Some prayed. Most of the slaves were shipped to South Carolina and Georgia, and I felt a connection: My mother was from South Carolina.

We met the Temne on a trip to Tasso Island. The ladies and children sang welcome songs as we left the boat, and we sat under a wide, beautiful tree. The chief attended, and we were inducted into the tribe.

I wanted to join the Tasso Island community long term. I’m learning the language, and I am now a chieftain. My title is ya bomposseh, which I have been told means “woman chief.” I’ll work with the head chief to help women and girls in the villages. My daughter and I returned to Tasso in November 2023 and brought food and baby formula. Now that I’m retired, I’d love to go back once a year. I don’t feel like a visitor there. I feel at home.

Wolfe's souvenirs from her trip to Germany

Wolfe's cousin's farmhouse in Amelsbüren

Debra Wolfe, 65

Current residence: Fort Wayne, Indiana

Connection: Wolfe's maternal ancestors hailed from Amelsbüren, a small town in northwestern Germany. Her paternal ancestors were also from Germany. They all arrived in the United States in 1847.

IN MAY 2023, my cousin welcomed me and my husband to his farmhouse in Amelsbüren. He held a round tray with tiny shot glasses and caramel liqueur. He couldn't speak English—our guides translated—but he toasted us, welcoming us to the family. We came here because I've researched my family history for over 40 years, and I'd exhausted the records at home. I wanted to see where our ancestors came from. Family Tree Tours handled the logistics, helped with my research and found relatives. In the town of Offenbach an der Queich, I met about a dozen fifth cousins from the Gensheimer family, on my father's side, at the community hall. The mayor attended and gave us a tour. Three different Gensheimer families live there. My research showed they're all related, which they didn't know.

Throughout the trip, I learned about my family. I received names and charts. I saw houses where my maternal and paternal ancestors lived. I learned that my cousin—the one who served us caramel liqueur—lives and farms on ancestral land, as our family has lived and farmed there for centuries. I learned that my maternal ancestors were in Amelsbüren before 1500. I discovered that one cousin on my paternal side works for the mayor, one is an elected official and other family members own a winery. I've been corresponding with some of my German cousins since our vacation, and we've exchanged names, dates and photos. I feel like I have a bigger family now.

As I walked through my ancestors' villages and met relatives, I felt awe and gratitude and amazement at their hospitality for someone they'd just met. And I felt happy. I was like a sponge, taking it all in. ■

Breakthrough: AI-Assisted Colonoscopies

John Lloyd

JOHN LLOYD put off colon cancer screenings for years. When he finally had his first colonoscopy, at age 56, it found a tumor the size of a lemon. “I was lucky,” he says. “It was stage 3 cancer that hadn’t spread beyond some lymph nodes.”

Chemotherapy, radiation and surgery wiped out his cancer. Now Lloyd, 72, president of an electrical contracting firm in Durham, North Carolina, gets colonoscopies every three years. But his most recent colonoscopy came with a high-tech twist: artificial intelligence to help spot polyps that can become cancers.

“It’s like having another set of eyes,” says Neeraj Sachdeva, M.D., of RMG Gastroenterology in Raleigh, North Carolina. “It allows you to do a more meticulous exam.”

A traditional colonoscopy relies on the eyes of the doctor, yet some types of abnormal growths in the colon can be hard to spot. GI Genius from Medtronic, the first AI-assisted colonoscopy system available in the U.S., got FDA marketing authorization in 2021; others are coming out. The computer-aided system swiftly analyzes in real time the high-definition video images from a doctor’s endoscope (the tiny camera used to examine the interior walls of the colon during a colonoscopy). Potential trouble spots are highlighted in a green-edged box on the monitor viewed by the doctor.

It’s estimated that in 2024, 152,810 people in the U.S. will be diagnosed with colorectal cancer; 53,010 will die, according to the American Cancer Society. Colonoscopy lowers cancer risk by finding precancers and removing them, Sachdeva says. AI has made colonoscopies even more accurate: In

► Prostate Cancer Therapy Spares Healthy Tissue

A new treatment for one type of metastatic prostate cancer delivers radiation directly to prostate tumor cells and spares healthy tissue. Approved by the FDA in 2022, Pluvicto is a type of cancer treatment called theranostics, in which the body is scanned so doctors can identify where the cancer is, followed by treatment that attaches to the targeted cancer cells before releasing radiation. The median overall survival of those who received Pluvicto plus the best standard of care (BSoC) increased by four months compared with those who received the BSoC alone.

► A Better Way to Check Lymph Nodes for Cancer

Surgeons typically remove additional tissue during cancer surgeries so lymph nodes can be checked for cancer. It’s a challenging, time-consuming task, and lymph nodes are frequently missed. A new imaging system called InVision uses shortwave infrared light to highlight lymph tissue. In an ongoing study of about 100 patients, 4 percent were found to have cancerous lymph nodes previously overlooked by doctors.

Get That Colon Check—Now!

“Colorectal cancer mortality is going down because we’re picking up more cancers and precancers as more people get screened,” says Sachdeva. But some midlife and older adults aren’t getting checked. “The technology is there,” says Sachdeva. “If we catch your lesion early, taking care of it is simple. You can avoid chemotherapy, radiation and surgery.”

Breakthrough: Lifesaving Surgery for Deadly Bleeding Strokes

Surgery to remove brain
bleeds

KAY WILLIAMS felt “real, real strange.” Her head ached; her eyes grew heavy. As she slid out of her office chair, a colleague quickly dialed 9-1-1. “My headache turned to blackness,” says Williams, 63. “I guess that’s when the aneurysm in my brain erupted.”

It was May 2018. Williams was a healthy 56-year-old with three grown children and a successful career as a new-car salesperson in Atlanta. Suddenly, she was having the most lethal kind of brain attack—a hemorrhagic stroke caused by a burst blood vessel. With no effective treatments for this emergency that strikes more than 100,000 Americans each year, her chance for survival hovered at 60 percent and her odds for a lifetime of disability were as high as 88 percent. When a neurosurgeon at Atlanta’s Grady Memorial Hospital told Williams’ daughter about an experimental procedure to drain the blood clot from her mother’s brain, she said yes.

“There’s no more sensitive organ than the brain,” says neurosurgeon Gustavo Pradilla, M.D., chief of neurosurgery for Grady Health System, who performed the procedure. After a hemorrhagic stroke, every minute brings more damage. Blood accumulates and crushes delicate tissue. “The clots can be the size of a tennis ball, generating a tremendous amount of pressure in the Researchers at the Medical University of South Carolina are testing the feasibility of equipping standard ambulances with magnetic resonance imaging machines so that EMTs can evaluate stroke victims before they reach the hospital.

► Also on the Horizon: Early Test for Parkinson’s Disease

A new blood test uses AI to find warning signs for Parkinson’s up to seven years before a person has symptoms. Early diagnosis may allow for treatments to delay or prevent the disease from damaging nerve cells that control movement.

Stroke Symptoms? Act FAST!

It takes stroke victims a median time of 140 minutes to get to a hospital, according to a 2024 study. Waiting to call 9-1-1 could drastically lower your odds for lifesaving treatments, says Pradilla. Wondering if you’re having a stroke? Use the American Stroke Association’s FAST guide: Facial drooping, an Arm (or leg) that’s suddenly impaired, Slurred speech or inability to communicate, and Time to call 9-1-1!

brain,” he explains. Treatment typically involves drugs to lower blood pressure and correct clotting problems, but those approaches can’t remove the clot itself. Conventional brain surgery is a risky last resort, Pradilla says.

He and a team instead approached Williams’ brain bleed with a procedure called minimally invasive parafascicular surgery (MIPS). First, they used brain scans to create a road map of Williams’ bleed. Then they threaded a thin, pencil-shaped device called BrainPath along brain folds to ground zero for her stroke. Guided by live, magnified imaging, the device gently nudged aside white matter connections between brain areas that carry signals for speech, memory and other vital functions. The surgeons then inserted a tool called Myriad that suctioned up the clot. “Clots can become fibrous, almost like rubber,” Pradilla says. “But no matter how hard, we can get it out.”

MIPS was tested over six years in 300 people with intracerebral hemorrhage at 37 medical centers across the U.S. Survival and recovery in the 180 days after a stroke were higher for stroke patients who had MIPS than for those who received medications alone, according to a 2024 study in The New England Journal of Medicine. “I have seen many amazing outcomes,” he says. “Patients came in unable to speak and walk, almost in a coma-like state with a breathing tube. [These patients] can now walk, speak and return to a normal life.”

Just four months later, Williams was back to selling cars, a job she’s loved for 38 years now. Her only concession: wearing sneakers instead of high heels because she feels a little dizzy sometimes. She had a seizure a few months after returning to work and takes anti-seizure medication. “I feel better,” she says. “I think better with the medication too.” Williams now gives motivational talks to youth groups, including incarcerated young people. “I want people to know to always believe in God and have faith,” she says. “That research saved my life.”

DIABETES

Breakthrough:

Small and Easy Insulin Pumps for Type 2 Diabetes

WHEN TONYA CRUTCHFIELD went swimming in the scenic Buffalo River in Arkansas in June, she wore an insulin pump smaller than a deck of cards under her bathing suit. “Nobody could see it,” says Crutchfield, 54, who has had type 2 diabetes since her 30s. “I don’t have to carry needles and insulin or find a private place to give myself a shot.”

Like about 1 in 4 of the roughly 35 million Americans with type 2 diabetes, Crutchfield uses insulin to help control her blood sugar. Giving herself four shots a day required pricking her finger for a blood sugar check, calculating her next insulin dose, filling a syringe and injecting herself. Sometimes Crutchfield did it in her car or in a bathroom stall. But too often, she skipped it—especially if she was busy, or simply couldn't tote her insulin around in a cooler bag to keep it cold. "I hated the shots," she says.

As a result, her blood sugar was often sky-high, boosting her risk for eye problems, nerve damage and kidney trouble. At her doctor's suggestion, in late 2023 she tried V-Go, an insulin patch pump specifically designed and FDA approved for people with type 2 diabetes. The disposable device attaches to her skin with adhesive and contains a day's worth of insulin delivered continuously through a tiny needle into her skin. Before meals, she can adjust the dosage so it can handle blood sugar increases from any carbohydrates—such as bread, pasta, rice, fruit or dessert—she's about to eat. "My sugars have been fantastic," she says. Crutchfield's A1C—a measure of blood sugar control over two to three months—fell from a dangerously high 13 percent to below 7 percent, the goal for most people with diabetes, according to the American Diabetes Association.

Patch pumps have been around for nearly 20 years, but they were traditionally used by people with type 1 diabetes. Now several patch pumps for type 2 are on the market, and more are in development.

"If you can get your A1C down and stable, it can reduce risk for complications of diabetes, especially for the eyes, kidneys and nerves," says endocrinologist Shunzhong Bao, M.D., of CHI St. Vincent Little Rock Diagnostic Clinic, who treats Crutchfield's diabetes. "Stable, controlled blood sugar also reduces cardiovascular risks."

► Spinal Cord Stimulation for Diabetic Neuropathy

Implanted spinal cord stimulation systems from four companies gained FDA approval in 2022 and 2023 for easing the pain of a type of nerve damage called diabetic peripheral neuropathy. In a 2023 study of 216 people with this painful condition, 76 percent of those who received mild electrical signals applied to the spine reported their pain improved by 50 percent or more after six months.

► Foot Mat Detects Early Foot Ulcers

An FDA-cleared foot mat senses temperature changes in the soles of the feet, a warning sign of increased risk for foot ulcers, infection and even amputation. Used daily for 20 seconds, SmartMat from Podimetrics scans feet for temperature changes; in a 2020 study, device users had fewer foot ulcers.

use and waterproof, although the insulin dose often can't be as finely calibrated as with a traditional insulin pump. And with a pump, you still have to test your blood sugar four times a day, though newer continuous-glucose monitors that send the data right to your phone make that simpler. "Living with diabetes is not easy," Bao notes. "These patch pumps can be really helpful."

Tackle Type 2 Diabetes Aggressively

"If your blood sugar is really out of control, beta cells in your pancreas that produce insulin can die faster," says Bao. "Getting blood sugar down can preserve beta cell function. Or if your blood sugar has been high for many years, you may have a severe insulin deficiency." Newer diabetes drugs may reduce or eliminate the need for insulin in type 2 diabetes, but for now it's a good tool for controlling blood sugar.

HEART HEALTH

Breakthrough: Game-Changing Treatment for Heart Failure

LARRY GOODMAN checks his weight, blood pressure and pulse every morning. Then, as he makes breakfast in his kitchen in Middletown, Delaware, a digital health company 3,000 miles away in California reviews his numbers. "When you have a bad heart, every time you feel something you think, This is it," says Goodman, 69. "But I don't panic anymore. If there are numbers I don't like, I get a call from my doctor's office in 10 to 15 minutes."

Goodman has "heart failure with reduced ejection fraction," meaning that the left side of his heart is too weak to pump enough blood out to his body.

Goodman first landed in the hospital with heart failure 15 years ago, unable to breathe and with fluid accumulating in his body, and had been in and out of the hospital ever since.

Doctors can monitor heart failure patients from miles away.

Larry Goodman

A few years ago, he joined a program at ChristianaCare, a Delaware-based health system that offered a new digital monitoring program aimed at helping Black Americans with advanced heart failure get access to a breakthrough treatment: a combination of four drugs that together can save lives.

The drugs cut the risk of early death by 70 percent, improve symptoms and even help the heart function better. Without them, 10 to 15 percent of people with advanced heart failure are likely to die in just two years. In 2022, the American Heart Association and American College of Cardiology updated their guideline-directed medical therapy and for the first time recommended these four drugs, hailed as the

Recognize Early Heart Failure Signs

Nearly 1 million U.S. adults are diagnosed each year with heart failure, but more than one-third of cases are missed by primary care physicians at early, more treatable stages, according to a 2021 study. Don't overlook the early warnings of heart failure: Shortness of breath, a dry cough that's worse at night, tiredness, nausea, low appetite and leg swelling or an increase in the girth of your torso are potential indicators of fluid buildup when the heart isn't pumping strongly, says Sourin Banerji, M.D. If you are diagnosed, make an appointment with a heart failure specialist, Banerji suggests.

“fantastic four.” Yet most people who could benefit aren't getting them. In a 2024 Duke University study of 33,036 older adults hospitalized for heart failure, 4 out of 5 were candidates for the drug combo but fewer than 1 in 6 got them. Among older adults, rates are especially low.

A tidal wave of new digital and remote monitoring programs is changing that. Those with heart failure can now track key health indicators at home with close monitoring by health care practitioners.

“It's almost like the clinic is brought to the patients,” says Sourin Banerji, M.D., medical director of Advanced Heart Failure at ChristianaCare Health. Other health systems are using a variety of home monitoring options, including an implanted sensor called CardioMEMS, approved by the FDA in 2022.

It's helping. “We see every day how much better our patients are doing,” says Banerji. “They have more stamina. They can remain independent longer. They're less likely to be readmitted to the hospital.”

The four types of drugs used in this treatment strategy are a combination of mineralocorticoid receptor antagonists to remove extra water and sodium from the body; blood pressure drugs that help to relax blood vessels so the heart doesn't have to work as hard; beta-blockers to reduce heart rate and sometimes improve some heart damage; and sodium glucose cotransporter-2 inhibitors, diabetes drugs shown to reduce symptoms and deaths in people with heart failure.

Goodman is on all four medications now. “My doctor adjusted my doses often,” he says. “And I do feel better. Less breathless.” A lifelong trumpet player, Goodman hopes his stronger, steadier heart will let him get back to participating in Taps Across America, a nationwide Memorial Day observance. →

DIGESTIVE HEALTH

Breakthrough: A New Treatment for C. Diff

FREDA PYLES' ROAD trip from Wichita, Kansas, to her home in Pennsylvania was a nightmare. Severe diarrhea meant urgent bathroom breaks at every rest stop for hundreds of miles. In Ohio, her husband took her to an emergency room. "I was dehydrated. My kidneys were shutting down," says Pyles, 76, of her 2021 ordeal. "I couldn't walk."

Pyles was infected with Clostridioides difficile (commonly known as C. diff or C. difficile)—a highly contagious germ that kills 30,000 Americans annually, most of them older adults. The infection took hold when an antibiotic prescribed for a tooth infection killed beneficial bacteria in her intestines that can normally keep C. diff in check.

A gold standard C. diff treatment, the antibiotic vancomycin, brought her a little relief but quickly set the stage for more trouble. It further wiped out protective gut bacteria, allowing tough C. diff spores to grow, release diarrhea-triggering toxins and kick-start a new infection. Back home in rural Russell, Pennsylvania, Pyles spent her days in a chair close to the bathroom. She stopped gardening, keeping bees, swimming at the local YMCA and helping her husband take care of the couple's flock of chickens. For four months she had recurrent C. diff infections. It's a dangerous cycle that affects about 35 percent of older adults after a first bout of C. diff and kills 1 in 4 of them, according to a 2022 Yale University study of Medicare beneficiaries.

"By January I had lost 45 pounds, could hardly walk to the bathroom and had fallen a couple of times," she says. "My husband was really worried. He told a friend he was slowly watching me die."

Freda Pyles

In November 2022, the treatment—Rebyota—became the first FDA-approved fecal microbiota product and the first against recurrent C. diff. “We’re giving the microbiota a boost,” says gastroenterologist Paul Feuerstadt, M.D., an associate clinical professor at Yale University School of Medicine who studied the treatment and provided Pyles’ transplant. “We’re allowing a healthy, diverse microbiota to grow and become strong in a much more expedited way. It’s a real game changer.” In studies of people with recurrent C. diff, a fecal microbiota transplant was effective at stopping repeat infections for 80 percent of them at eight weeks, and 92 percent hadn’t had a recurrence two years later.

Fecal transplants aren’t new; they were used for severe diarrhea 1,600 years ago in China. Researchers have been studying them since the 1950s, not only for C. diff but for other digestive problems like irritable bowel syndrome and ulcerative colitis, depression, anxiety and diabetes. Specialists have used them against severe, repeat C. diff for over 10 years, and medical guidelines have recommended them for that use since 2017.

But Feuerstadt notes that having FDA-approved C. diff treatments is a major advance. In 2023, the FDA OK’d a second fecal microbiota treatment for C. diff. Called Vowst, it’s in the form of capsules taken by mouth. “The difference between FDA-approved products and non-FDA approved is that we know what we are administering,” Feuerstadt says. “We have a much higher level of sophistication. We’re seeing an evolution. This could be used much earlier in recurrent C. diff and by physicians in the community, not just by specialists. It shuts down recurrence. And it lifts the burden of anxiety, depression and fear that people with recurrent C. diff have.” ■

Sari Harrar writes for numerous national publications. She is a contributing editor to AARP THE MAGAZINE.

Rethink Your Antibiotic Use

You can lower your risk for a C. diff infection by using antibiotics only when necessary, thereby protecting your gut microbiome from C. diff, says Feuerstadt. When you’re in a situation where you could be exposed, such as visiting a hospital or nursing home, “wash your hands with soap and water for at least 15 seconds afterward,” he says. “Alcohol-based hand sanitizers don’t kill the spores of C. diff.”

YOUR ESSENTIAL VACCINE GUIDE

Here's what you need to stay safe this winter—and beyond By JESSICA MIGALA

WE KNOW. You're busy. You hate needles. You're betting you can tough it out this winter. After all, you had a COVID shot a few years ago, and who's really worried about the flu?

But what if you could not only dramatically reduce your risk of winding up in the hospital but also slash your risk of heart disease, dementia and chronic pain? Now would you be willing to roll up your sleeve?

"As we get older, we tend to start experiencing various chronic diseases, such as high blood pressure or heart and lung disease. In addition, the immune system begins to slow down, and it can struggle to protect you from infections," says Sharon Brangman, M.D., coprincipal investigator for the American Geriatrics Society Older Adults Vaccine Initiative. And as we're learning, many infections can have long-term consequences that we simply can't predict.

Here's a look at the vaccines you need now. You can even get many of them in just one visit.

For now, one dose every autumn

Flu

50 and above

One dose every fall, ideally in September or October

RSV

One dose, one time

Shingles

50 and above

Two-dose series, one time, each shot given two to six months apart

Pneumococcal

65 and above; 50 to 64 for those with underlying medical conditions

Once

Tdap/Td Booster

First dose in childhood; boosters throughout adulthood

Once every 10 years

WHY?

“The virus has changed a lot over the years. The antibodies we have don’t work as well against the strains of the virus that are circulating now,” says Sandra Adamson Fryhofer, M.D., an internist and the American Medical Association’s liaison to the CDC’s Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices.

Seventy to 85 percent of flu-related deaths are in people over 65, yet just 7 out of 10 adults 65 and up got a flu shot last year. “Sometimes the vaccine can keep you from getting the flu altogether, while other times it can provide partial protection so you get a milder form of the disease,” says Brangman.

“We really underestimated the morbidity that can come from RSV, particularly in older adults. It can cause severe pneumonia,” says Morgan Katz, M.D., an infectious disease expert with Johns Hopkins Medicine. Clinical trials found the vaccine was 83 percent effective in reducing the risk of severe disease.

If you’ve had chicken pox (as 99 percent of people born in or before 1980 have), the virus lives on in your body, where it can emerge as painful blisters and a rash, as well as lead to significant nerve pain, says Katz. The good news is that this vaccine is more than 90 percent effective at preventing the disease.

The FDA has just approved a new vaccine that covers 84 percent of the strains that cause invasive pneumococcal disease, such as pneumonia, meningitis and bloodstream infections. “This is such a killer of people,” says Fryhofer. One in six older adults who get pneumococcal meningitis, for instance, die from the disease.

Td protects against tetanus and diphtheria, while Tdap protects against those diseases plus pertussis (whooping cough). You may have received the Tdap vaccination as a child, but if you did not, you should now. In addition, it’s advised that you get a Td booster every 10 years, which is easy to overlook. A nasty cut may also require a booster.

EXTRA CONSIDERATIONS

A combined COVID-19 and flu vaccine may be available in 2025. Preliminary results show the combo may offer greater immunity.

There are several types of flu vaccines available. “We recommend adults over 65 get the high-dose flu shot, which helps create a stronger immune response,” says Brangman.

Right now, you only need a single dose. There are three different vaccines approved, and you can get whichever one is available where you are.

The vaccine, called Shingrix, can be given with other vaccines. You can also get it if you’ve had shingles before (just wait until any active infection is over).

Current recommendations advise getting a single dose of the PCV21 vaccine (Capvaxine).

If you have young kids in your life, consider getting the Tdap booster instead of Td. “Many babies are too young for the vaccine, and they depend on everyone around them to be vaccinated,” Fryhofer says.

BONUS BENEFITS

Receiving the COVID vaccine reduces the risk of developing long COVID—debilitating symptoms like brain fog and fatigue that linger continuously for three months or more after an infection—by up to 52 percent.

Getting the flu vaccine is associated with a 30 percent lower risk of heart attack and death from cardiovascular disease. One possible reason? Flu infection triggers inflammation that may worsen atherosclerosis.

Have grandkids? Infants and young children are susceptible to RSV but cannot receive the vaccine. Vaccinating yourself can help protect them too.

A 2024 study found that the shingles vaccine “is associated with a significantly lower risk of dementia” for at least six years after vaccination.

Medicare Part B will cover the cost of the pneumococcal vaccine.

People who got the Tdap or Td vaccine were 30 percent less likely to develop Alzheimer’s compared with those who were unvaccinated, according to 2023 research published in the Journal of Alzheimer’s Disease.

There's No Place Like (A NEW) Home

From the Big City to Green Acres, these older homebuyers chased their dream for a better life

By David Hochman

CHANGING RESIDENCES at a later stage in life is all about embracing a new rhythm. Perhaps your empty nest feels a bit too roomy and the time has come to downsize to an urban condo. Or after years of battling rush hour traffic every day, you're craving someplace that's greener and more walkable, where the pace is more humane. If something's calling you to move, it's not too late to relocate. More than 6 million Americans age 55 and up take the leap and find a new address each year, with women leading the way, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. Here's a look at a few of them.

DAVE DALTON, 65, AND JILL DALTON, 64

Seeking Culture and Active Lifestyle on a Smaller Scale

→ FROM BOOMING CHARLOTTE, NORTH CAROLINA, TO THE TINY TOWN OF ABINGDON, VIRGINIA

WHY RELOCATE? The Daltons love Charlotte (metro area around 3 million), but when Dave retired as a manufacturing executive in 2021, he craved a more active, outdoor lifestyle. He and Jill both wanted a walkable small town with vibrant culture—an arts scene, great food and a more youthful population. They went all in on Abingdon, with a historic main street, access to trout fishing and biking, more than 30 restaurants, and the nation's longest-running professional theater. And with the town's median age of 45, retirees are able to mix with younger residents. “Can you say dream town?” asks Jill.

DOLLARS AND SENSE: The Daltons bought a three-floor historic house from 1803 and are making the renovation a retirement project. Adding HVAC and bumping up those low Jefferson-era ceilings isn't cheap, but costs in general “are a fraction of what they are in Charlotte,” Dave says.

NEW ABODE, NEW HORIZONS: “Life is more relaxed, and there's a warmth from people you don't always get in an urban setting,” Jill says. “Once you meet someone here, you look out for each other.”

Charlotte, North Carolina

According to Dave, there aren't enough days in the week for all the activities Abingdon offers. He already serves on an Abingdon board and a tourism advisory council, and there's hiking, kayaking, horseback riding, an annual fiddler's convention, pickleball and tons of golf. “I thought people were supposed to slow down in retirement,” he says, “but it's not looking that way.”

NANCY HESS, 70

Finding Energy in a Downsize to a Big City

→ FROM KURAL BURLINGTON, KANSAS, TO COSMOPOLITAN KANSAS CITY, KANSAS

WHY RELOCATE? “Don’t laugh,” says Hess, who had lived in small Kansas towns all her life, “but my gut was telling me that if I stayed in Burlington, I would turn into one of those little old ladies who never leaves the house.” She admits she felt she’d been “coasting” ever since Sam, her partner of 22 years, passed away 13 years ago. So after retiring as a computer program analyst at a nuclear plant in 2020, “I felt like stepping out of my comfort zone and pushing myself a little.”

DOLLARS AND SENSE: City life is more expensive. Hess’ senior living community in Kansas City required entrance and service fees, and K.C. prices are higher for things like dinners out and entertainment, but “that’s why I worked a desk job for 34 years,” she says. With plenty of activities at her complex—there’s a fitness center, for example—the convenience and camaraderie balance out the costs.

NEW ABODE, NEW HORIZONS: “It feels like a fresh start to me,” says Hess, who loves being within 30 minutes of countless activities and events. Having people from her community to do things with is icing on the cake. She attends Kansas City Monarchs baseball games, summertime jazz band concerts and dinner theater events, as well as visiting local historical societies, libraries and quilt shops. “At first I was a little bit hesitant going around town, but now I’m happy even if I’m getting lost and finding my way back home.”

RABBI JOE HAMPLE, 68, AND BARRY WENDELL, 75

Greater Meaning at a Much Slower Pace

→ FROM BUSY LOS ANGELES TO THE SOMEWHAT SLEEPY MORGANTOWN, WEST VIRGINIA

WHY RELOCATE? Joe and Barry met and married at a gay synagogue in Los Angeles, where Joe was studying to be a rabbi after a career as a systems analyst and Barry worked as a cantorial soloist and teacher. They wanted out. “I had lived in Los Angeles for 25 years already and was, like, I’m ready for something new,” says

Barry. After Joe landed a rabbi gig deep in Appalachia, the move was on. DOLLARS AND SENSE: “Morgantown is dirt cheap by California standards,” says Joe. “We never could’ve afforded a house in L.A. or any hot California real estate market.”

NEW ABODE, NEW HORIZONS: For a pair of confirmed urbanites, moving to a quieter locale meant finding God in the details. “Figuring out your favorite flavors of ice cream, taking long walks, spending time with the nice lady next door who feeds our cat—the little things take on greater meaning here,” Joe says. But the pace carved out more time as well. Barry found a late-in-life calling as a public servant: He spent two terms on Morgantown’s City Council and even ran for U.S. Congress in 2022.

6 Questions to Ask Yourself Before Making the Big Move

Why do you want to move? What are you trying to accomplish?

Are you looking to be closer to your family? Or maybe you crave more sunshine. Be clear about your priorities.

What do you love about your current home that you can't live without?

Make sure your new location satisfies your must-have requirements.

What kind of lifestyle are you seeking?

Consider the activities you enjoy now and whether you can reasonably pursue them in your new home.

What are your health care needs, and can those be met in your new home? Consider the quality, cost and proximity of medical services, especially if you have a condition that requires routine checkups and care.

Can you afford the cost of living in this new place? Take a hard look at your finances. Selling your home, saving the equity and moving to a more affordable area with lower housing costs can be a great way to stretch your retirement savings.

Will it be less costly to live in this new place over the long term? A lower cost of living now doesn't guarantee a lower cost of living into the future. You have to consider whether it's going to be sustainable and affordable over the long term in that location. Do careful research on the place you're considering moving to and try to anticipate factors that may inflate your cost of living.

JENNIFER OLIVER O'CONNELL, 58, AND LYNN O'CONNELL, 63

Finding a Place of Faith and Affordability

→ FROM SUBURBAN ORANGE COUNTY, CALIFORNIA, TO THE SMALL DEEP SOUTH TOWN OF MUSCLE SHOALS, ALABAMA

WHY RELOCATE? “California prices are insane!” says Jennifer, a yoga teacher and freelance journalist. Lynn, a service engineer for tech businesses, was commuting 57 miles each way. Neither liked “the stranglehold of constantly working only to feel like we were just scraping by,” as Jennifer puts it. The O'Connells wanted a place that aligned with their Christian values. “Muscle Shoals instantly hit our hearts,” says Jennifer. She sent an email last winter to a pastor there whose sermons she appreciated. “He got back to me within an hour. Then a campus coordinator connected me with a Realtor who helped us find a home. I was, like, we're doing this!” Last June, the O'Connells moved.

DOLLARS AND SENSE: Money goes much further in Muscle Shoals. “We have a great three-bedroom, two-bath house that's roughly half the rent we were paying for much less space in California,” says Lynn, who landed a service route with a regional communications and IT company.

NEW ABODE, NEW HORIZONS: Having a built-in spiritual community provided a soft landing. “An entire crew from church showed up at our house to move us in and make us feel cared for,” Jennifer says.

STEVE RODGERS, 59, AND JANE RODGERS, 60

Following Family, Jobs and Heart

➔ FROM A TONY D.C. SUBURB TO THE HUSTLE-BUSTLE BIG APPLE TO THE QUAINT VILLAGE OF HOBART, NEW YORK

Steve and Jane Rodgers

WHY RELOCATE? In 2019, after their son, Sam, experienced a significant health crisis, the Rodgerses left the leafy D.C. exurb of Leesburg, Virginia, their home for 20 years, to be near Sam in New York City. With his health stabilized in 2023, Jane and Steve headed way upstate, to Hobart, New York (population 397), for ample space and a quieter, more affordable ease into retirement.

DOLLARS AND SENSE: Even with downsizing, moving from a single-family home into a two-bedroom Manhattan apartment wasn't cheap. "Rent, groceries, restaurants, taxes—literally everything costs more in New York City," says Jane, a nonprofit executive who, like Steve, can work remotely. It helped to have additional income from renting the Virginia place, but Steve, who designs security systems, wanted to reinvest the cash after selling that home in 2020. "Property within a two-hour drive of New York City was out of our reach, so we pushed to three hours, and, yep, that did it," he says.

NEW ABODE, NEW HORIZONS: The Rodgerses found a beautiful old four-bedroom house on an acre and a half, with a converted barn/guesthouse "that is part of our retirement plan," says Jane, whose goal is to work two more years. Steve intends to work until age 65. "We'll use the guesthouse as an Airbnb beginning next year, and hopefully that income will keep us going," Jane says. And "we have enough space to host Sam and his friends anytime he wants to come up," she adds.

➔ FROM TROPICAL PEARL CITY IN CENTRAL O'AHU, HAWAII, TO GO-GO GREATER LAS VEGAS

Sunny Springs Park

Zaiden, now 10. "In a more affordable setting, we could work to live rather than living to work," she says.

DOLLARS AND SENSE: Hawai'i has the highest cost of living in the U.S. Doreen couldn't believe the savings: The four-bedroom, three-bath house she and Marquise, an Air Force reservist and truck driver, bought for $300,000, "would have cost twice that back on O'ahu."

NEW ABODE, NEW HORIZONS: Doreen feared that homesickness would overwhelm her, but Las Vegas has Hawaiian barbecue restaurants, hula shops, famous Hawaiian entertainers. "It's easy to live aloha here," she says.

Reining In for an Easier, Fuller Life

➔ FROM A SEVEN-ACRE IDAHO FARM WITH HORSES TO A DOWNSIZED HOME IN BOISE

WHY RELOCATE? Magical as it was, "farm life was just too costly and challenging" to maintain as the Murrisons got older, so "we made the hardest choice we ever faced," says Teri, a travel writer. "During the wintertime especially, we were hiring people to come in and clean up horse poop and do other things we no longer wanted to do." The Murrisons sold the farm and moved to Idaho's capital city in January 2022.

DOLLARS AND SENSE: "When you factor in the cost of keeping animals and how much we paid to irrigate and for power and gas, we're saving a significant amount," says Rich, a retired educator. The Murrisons re-homed their three horses. That leaves extra for urban niceties like dinners out ("all kinds of great ethnic restaurants nearby," Teri says) and pursuing passions like skiing.

NEW ABODE, NEW HORIZONS: "We hit the neighbor lottery," Teri says, with warm and welcoming residents on all four sides. ■

The Bravest of the Brave

Interviews by A.J. BAIME

The Vietnam War was nearing a painful end 50 years ago.

But the war that divided a generation also provided stories of the sacrifice and courage of the roughly 2.7 million Americans who served there.

Veterans of the fighting in Southeast Asia are in their 70s or older now. They endured disdain after returning from the war, and many have wrestled with physical and psychological problems since, ranging from exposure to Agent Orange to post-traumatic stress disorder.

As a Veterans Day tribute to those who served in Vietnam, we've talked to some of the bravest of the brave—the 268 men who received the Congressional Medal of Honor for extraordinary gallantry. We also examined what life has been like after the Medal of Honor. While their deeds are exceptional, their lives reflect much of what happened to the men and women who answered the call to serve in Vietnam.

“I Had to Go Get My Brother”

Sammy Lee Davis, 77
Indianapolis

I WAS BORN in Dayton, Ohio. My dad was in the military. I joined the Army in 1966, and I remember stepping off the airplane in Vietnam. It was nice and cool in the plane, and it was 100 degrees outside. Stepping off the airplane, we soldiers looked at each other in amazement.

On the night of November 18, 1967, I was with Battery C, 2nd Battalion, 4th Artillery, 9th Infantry Division, patrolling a firebase. We were told we were going to get hit that night, and the battle started at 2 a.m. There was a river, and we saw the enemy coming toward us on the other side, shooting at us. The Viet Cong fired an RPG [rocket-propelled grenade] to hit our cannon, and the explosion threw me, unconscious, back into my foxhole. They thought I was dead. My ears were ringing, and I couldn't hear much. When I came to, I could see the enemy running toward me, and I did my job as a soldier. I picked up my M16 and started firing.

That's when one of our guys, Wendell Holloway, of Stockton, California, waved his hat at me from the other side of the river, shouting, “Don't shoot, I'm a GI!” He screamed, “Come get me!” My back was broken, my ribs were crushed and I'd been shot in the right leg with an AK-47. But I had to go get my brother, because he would have done the same for me. I swam across the river, and when I got there, there were three men—not just Wendell—all wounded, one unconscious. I used an air mattress to help get us all back to the other side. I dragged everyone back across the river, and when I got there, my guys helped get everyone out. We all survived.

When I woke up in a hospital in Japan, I'd been unconscious for a few days. General William Westmoreland was standing beside my bed. He had some 30 beehives [pieces of shrapnel] in his hand that a surgeon had removed from my body. He said, “Son, we're going to retire you from the Army and send you home.” But I didn't want to go home. General Westmoreland understood. I needed closure—I needed it for my soul to be OK. So I went back to Vietnam.

I set foot back on American soil on March 13, 1968. You have probably seen footage of the ceremony when I received the Medal of Honor. In the movie Forrest Gump, when Forrest is receiving his medal, that is my actual film footage. They put Tom Hanks' face over mine. Every time I see Forrest Gump, it brings back memories.

I have often told people that if I hadn't received the Medal of Honor, I'd probably have become a cow thief or something. In other words, I probably would have been doing bad things. But because of the Medal of Honor and the respect that I have for it, I didn't want to do anything that would cause disrespect to it. It kept me doing right. In fact, when I learned that I was going to receive this medal, I thought right then, I'm going to have to be good. And I started trying to do better and better at everything I did. It worked.

After three years in the Army, I was medically retired. I couldn't do anything without hurting really badly, but I knew I had to have a job. I went to work for Champion Laboratories in West Salem, Illinois, a company owned by Andy Granatelli, who was a great man. I don't believe he was a veteran, but he acted like he was a veteran. [Readers may have heard of Granatelli, who was a legendary race car driver, CEO of STP and a major sponsor of Indianapolis 500 race cars.]

At the same time, the Medal of Honor has become a way of life. It's a brotherhood. We all know what each other went through, and we encourage each other to stand up and be proud. The Medal of Honor has taught me how to express love for America and love for our fellow man.

I wear the medal when I am doing speaking engagements. I try not to preach politics, but I want every American to stand up for what they believe is right in their heart. I always open up to questions and answers, and I have found that I enjoy that most of all, especially when I am speaking to schools. There are some great questions you get from 10-year-olds.

When people ask me how the Medal of Honor changed my life, the first thing I say is that it kept me doing right my whole life, staying straight. It made me stand taller and walk prouder, always. Whenever I talk with people, I tell them the same thing: No matter what you're faced with, you don't lose until you quit trying.

African American Green Beret Finally Receives the Highest Honor

Paris Davis, 85
Alexandria, Virginia

THE SPECIAL Forces was fairly new at the time. It was a small group, formed to be the eyes and ears of America in battle, and to help keep us safe. When I started my training, I had already gone through Army Ranger and Airborne school. Earning my way into the Special Forces was no bowl of cherries.

We did a lot of classroom work, we jumped out of airplanes, and we did all kinds of things with weapons. A lot of people did not like the idea of me joining the Special Forces, and they were hoping I wouldn't make it. But I wouldn't back away. The more I did to prove that I could make it as a Green Beret, the stronger I became, the more friends I made and the easier it became. According to an article I saw in The New York Times, I was one of the first Black soldiers in the Special Forces.

In the spring of 1965, I was 26 years old and stationed in South Vietnam. We found out that there were a couple of places where the Viet Cong were sending troops down to about 25 kilometers from where we were located. We were going to have a showdown. The big battle at Bong Son was the result. It lasted a little over two days—mainly June 17 and 18, 1965.

I was with the 5th Special Forces Group (Airborne), 1st Special Forces, and the commander of a small operation called Team A-321. There were four Americans in that operation—myself and three others. We were there training a force of local volunteers from Vietnam. The battle was on. According to my official citation, “Captain Davis’s advice and leadership allowed the company to gain the tactical advantage, allowing it to surprise the unsuspecting enemy force and kill approximately 100 enemy soldiers.”

Following an ambush, I had a situation where I went out to get three of my fellow Special Forces soldiers who got spread out and bring them back to safety. [Also from the official Medal of Honor citation: “Captain Davis constantly exposed himself to hostile small arms fire to rally the inexperienced and disorganized company. He expertly directed both artillery and small arms fire.... Although wounded in the leg, he aided in the evacuation of other wounded men of his unit, but refused medical evacuation himself. Then, with complete disregard for his own life, he braved intense enemy fire to cross an open field to rescue his seriously wounded and immobilized team sergeant.”]

We fought hard for two days before we could put this behind us. I was shot up pretty bad, and I was in the hospital for a long time. I never asked any questions; I just let them take care of me.

Meanwhile, my fellow soldiers and others were concerned about what had happened at Bong Son, and they took it upon themselves to come together. While I was in the hospital, I didn’t know “s--- from Shinola,” as the saying goes. But people on my team made a big to-do about it, and I was nominated to receive the Medal of Honor.

What happened next will surprise you. It certainly surprised me. I don’t want it to sound like braggadocio, so please don’t take my words that way. I was awarded two Purple Hearts, the Silver Star and any number of other medals. But the government lost my Medal of Honor paperwork—not once but twice. How did it happen? That’s a question I have been asked many times. I don’t know! Don’t ask me, ask the government. When you find out, we’ll both know. But there was a lot of hullabaloo, and people on my team went to Congress. They wrote letters and did whatever they could to let people know.

When I received the Medal of Honor in the White House on March 3, 2023, it changed my life in many ways. But number one is, it changed the [perception] of people that I knew. Because so many people I knew did not understand what had happened at Bong Son. When they had a chance to read and hear the whole narrative as it is stated in my Medal of Honor citation, then they could understand—not just my story but the story of the people that were there with me. They knew that we had done something that was extraordinary.

Second, I invited people to be there that day. People who had trained with me, and families of soldiers. That day in the White House, the “I” became “we,” and the “we” became “us.” And it continues.

I will tell you, from my point of view at this time in my life, we have some great guys and gals in the military today. Just top-drawer. I think America should pay homage to the people in our military, who are willing to go out there and stick their thumb in the air to see which way the wind is blowing, to make sure that America remains free.

Paris Davis’ book Every Weapon I Had will be published by St. Martin’s Press next June.

A Marine's Hell Commences a Storied Career

Harvey "Barney" Barnum, 84
Reston, Virginia

IN DECEMBER 1965, I was attached to the 2nd Battalion, 9th Marines, as part of Operation Harvest Moon in the Que Son Mountains in Vietnam. On December 18, the enemy—well camouflaged and well dug-in—picked out our company commander. He had a map in his hand, and his radio operator was behind him. The enemy aimed, and all hell broke loose.

I hit the deck. This was the first time I'd ever been shot at. I looked up and all these young Marines were looking at me. I'd only been with this company for about four days, and they didn't even know my name. But I had a lieutenant's bar on my collar, and they knew: Officers give orders, and Marines follow.

These young Marines were scared. Anyone who says they're not scared when they're getting shot at is lying. We realized that not only were we ambushed, we were nearly surrounded.

I ran out and picked up our captain and brought him back to a more secure area. He died in my arms. I realized the radio was out there, and I was going to need it. So I ran out and took the radio off the dead radio operator. I strapped it on and contacted our battalion commander. Ultimately, the battalion commander told me, "You have to come out of there. We can't come get you." The battalion was fully engaged in the village of Ky Phu. "We're in one hell of a fight," I was told. "So if you can't come out yourself, you're in there by yourself tonight."

There was no future in that. If we stayed into the darkness, the enemy was going to finish us off. It was starting to get dark, and we had to move fast. I had engineers blow down some trees to clear a zone for helicopters to land. We put the dead and wounded on the helicopters. We had a medic named Doc Wes, and he was wounded. But he refused a shot of morphine, and he guided us on how to treat the wounded. He was the last one on the helicopter. As we put him on there, he was shot for the seventh time. Years later, I found out that he lived.

Those of us on the ground got ourselves organized, and I called in an airstrike against enemy positions. Ultimately, I told a group of Marines, "When you start going, you run as fast as you can, and don't stop unless someone gets shot. If someone gets shot, you pick him up and keep going, because Marines don't leave anyone on the battlefield." It took a long time, but I got my Marines out. We were fired at all night long.

I received the Medal of Honor in 1967. I was told that the White House did not want to present the medal, and I believe it was because the Johnson administration was getting so much bad press over the war. I was decorated by the secretary of the Navy, Paul Nitze, in a ceremony in Marine barracks in Washington, D.C.

I was the first Medal of Honor recipient to go back to Vietnam. I was a professional Marine, and there was a war going on. I felt that was my duty and that was where I belonged.

I would be naive to think that the Medal of Honor didn't help me in my career. I served in the military for 30 years and always tried to use the medal as a platform to continue serving. I traveled the country, speaking to students, American Legion posts, all kinds of audiences. I took every opportunity to let people know how fortunate they are to live in the greatest country in the world, but also to tell them that freedom isn't free. You have to work for it, you have to contribute.

Before I retired, I had the privilege of serving my country as a deputy assistant secretary of the Navy. I have had a Navy ship named after me—a destroyer. I have met sports stars, movie stars, kings and queens. None of that would have happened without the Medal of Honor. But the most important thing has been the opportunity to keep serving my country. When I retired from the military, I continued talking to audiences. To me, it is a chance to remind people—if they need reminding—that we live in the greatest country on Earth. ■

For the Sake of Japanese Sake

Former IT guy Jake Myrick turned his passion for a beverage into a thriving family business

WHEN MY WIFE and I came home to the States after 10 years of working in Japan, the thing we missed most was the unpasteurized sake. It's called Nama sake, and it just feels alive, the way kombucha does. But it's difficult to find Nama sake here because it cannot be shipped from Japan—it needs to stay refrigerated. And there was no one selling it in the Bay Area. So we started brewing it ourselves, in our garage. During my career, I'd started 10 companies, so opening a sake brewery seemed like a natural next step. And I'd grown up in a family that did its own canning, so I understood fermentation.

My biggest fear was, how do I, as a non-Japanese person, go into Japanese restaurants and tell them, "You should buy my sake"? It took me three years to make my first sale to a Japanese restaurant. The owner told me, "I always liked your sake, but I wasn't sure you were going to stick with this." But I guess we have. Our daughter, Olivia, was just finishing high school when we began brewing sake; now she's 28 and running the brewery with us.

We're working and sweating, but I'm enjoying myself. The reward is creating something you can taste and share, and that brings people together. We have customers of all ages, but young adults are our primary market. This next generation is drinking cleaner beverages.

Back when I worked in computer software, clients were always asking, "Why is this taking so long? Why is this bug still here?" With sake, the process just takes as long as it takes. We're not making widgets, we're making art. —As told to Gregg Segal

‘Music Is Hope’

Holocaust survivor Saul Dreier formed a band to comfort others

MUSIC HAS the ability to crack open hearts, to change minds, to heal, to comfort. When I was 89, I read about the concert pianist Alice Herz-Sommer, who had died at 110. Like me, she was a Nazi concentration camp survivor. And also like me, she had used music as a way through that terrible time. After the war, she continued to play to try to heal hearts. I felt that I needed to honor her in some way. It came to me that I should organize a Holocaust survivor band to continue her work. I told my wife, and she said I was crazy. I told my rabbi, and he said I was crazy too. But I was very stubborn.

During World War II, I was sent to several concentration and work camps in Poland. My whole family was killed, and I alone lived. There was a famous cantor in one of the camps with me, and he would sing Jewish songs. And in those moments of music, I found escape. One day, I realized that he needed a beat, so I managed to get two metal spoons, and I drummed for him: pum, pum, pum. Almost every night, we would all gather and sing, even though we were starving and exhausted. That is how I learned the drums. When we were liberated, I was sent to a displaced person’s camp in Italy, where there were actual instruments. I played the drums for the people in the camp and the town. Such joy!

After I went to America, between work and raising a family, I didn’t have time for music. But reading about Alice Herz-Sommer brought me back to the way music can reach hearts. I bought some drums for my band idea. At first, my wife said, “Either the drums go or you go,” but when you’ve been married so long, you fight for five minutes and make up 10 minutes later. Through people at my temple in Florida, I found other survivors and their children.

Our first concert, in 2014, was at the temple. We played Jewish, Polish, Hebrew and dancing music. We got a standing ovation! I felt like the sky had opened. And my wife? She said, “I live with you 51 years, and today you are my celebrity!”

In 10 years, we’ve played all over America (including the White House), Israel, Canada, Brazil and Poland. I will play for as long as I can, because music is hope. I am not interested in politics or taking sides. My purpose in life is to get people to see that we are all one, we all sing the same song. —As told to Beth Levine

She Mothered Dozens

Emma Patterson became a foster parent in her 50s ... and kept going

YOU DON'T start out thinking you're going to raise more than 40 children—including two of your own. But they're all my own, in a way.

When my kids, Tamara and Floyd, were in high school in Silver Spring, Maryland, they'd sometimes bring home friends who needed a place to stay. For whatever reason, their parents had kicked them out.

I'd been a housewife until my husband and I divorced, but at this point, I was working two jobs. My kids still thought I was the kind of mom who could make the cookies and fix the problem. So when one of their friends had trouble at home, they'd say, "Let's go talk to my mom.

She'll know what to do." We had a big house with extra bedrooms, and their friends who couldn't go home were always welcome to stay.

I really don't know what prompted me to formally apply to the foster care system, but after Tamara and Floyd were launched, in the 1990s, I decided to open my door to younger children. Often the agency would ask, "Will you just help us for a couple of days, until we can arrange for a longer-term placement?" They would bring the kids, and the kids would adjust and wouldn't want to leave. And so the county would let them stay. Most of the babies and toddlers I fostered stayed with me until they graduated from high school and eventually college. And most of them still keep in touch. My last foster daughter just graduated from high school in the spring.

You do get a stipend from the county for their upkeep, but it doesn't cover everything. Whenever a child needed a dress to wear to the prom, I would sew it for her. If someone needed money for an after-school activity, I took it from my savings. I never wanted them to feel different from the kids in biological families. I consider every single one of these children to be a member of my family.

I pray for my kids every night. I ask God to keep them safe and watch over them, because they all turned out to be really nice men and women. They all have jobs. Some of them own their own businesses, some of them work in the medical field.

Before I moved to a retirement community recently, I lived in the same house for 52 years, and the neighbors knew there were always children staying with me. Not too long ago, one of them told me they'd never known the kids were foster children.

They'd thought I was just taking care of relatives—family members' children. There's no better compliment I could have gotten. Every child deserves that level of love and care. So when my neighbor said that, I thought to myself, You know what? I didn't do too bad.

—As told to Robin Westen

Nessman on his new job and, inset, a few steps from heroism

Being the Guy Who Saved the Baby

Ronald Nessman was down on his luck—until a split-second decision changed his life

IT ALL HAPPENED in about 10 seconds. This was a year ago, and I'd just been to a job interview to be a dishwasher at Applebee's. I was sitting outside a car wash, waiting for my sister. Nearby, I saw a baby stroller get picked up by a gust of wind and start rolling toward a busy road. Before I could even think, I ran and grabbed the stroller right before it went into traffic. The little boy had been with his great-aunt, but she had tripped and fallen, and his stroller had gotten away from her. I rolled him right back up to her and gave her a big hug.

That would have been the end of it, except that the whole thing was captured on video and went viral. Within a few days, it had been viewed 58 million times.

TV stations and newspapers wanted to hear my story, so I told them. My girlfriend had died five years earlier, and it broke me. All I could do was cry. I'd been clean and sober for years when she died, but I started using drugs again. I became homeless. I got beat up and left for dead on the railroad tracks in Fontana, California.

Then my sister took me in, and I realized I had to clean up my act. I stopped the drugs and went looking for a job. That's what had taken me to Applebee's that day. As I said to one of the TV reporters, if you want something different, you've got to do something different. And I wanted something different for myself.

All my life, I was always that person doing something stupid or wrong. I've been to prison four times. But suddenly people were saying nice things about me. They offered me money—though I never took a dime. People demanded that Applebee's hire me, which it did. And I learned that people are good. They would come into Applebee's and say, "Is that the guy who saved the baby? He really works here?" When I went to the DMV, people said, "Are you the guy that saved the baby?"

For the first time, I realized that I had been in a prison in my mind, thinking that I wasn't worth anything. When you feel worthless, that's how you expect to be treated. But now people were treating me like I had value. And it changed me. I'm open to everything. My confidence is through the roof. It's so much easier to speak to people. I feel I'm worthy.

I applied for a truck driver's license, and in April, after nearly a year at Applebee's, I started a job as a long-haul trucker. I loved my job, but this pays way better.

My message for others is that it's never too late to change. Until I was past 50, I used to do this and that, but today I work hard. I know what I'm doing, and I know that I make a difference. —As told to Andrea Atkins

“There’s somebody out there that will help you.”

Tom McSpedden never imagined he'd need help putting food on the table. After decades as a truck driver, health issues derailed his career and financial stability.

At 70, Tom found himself dependent on Social Security disability benefits. Despite receiving SNAP benefits, he often went hungry, highlighting the challenge of affording healthy food on a tight budget.

Tom's fortunes changed thanks to a misdial. Seeking help after emergency SNAP allotments ended in 2023, he accidentally reached Erika Murdoch, a CalFresh specialist at Sacramento Food Bank & Family Services, an AARP Foundation grantee.

Erika recognized that Tom might qualify for additional benefits. "Many CalFresh recipients don't realize there are other costs they can report that qualify them for a higher benefit," she explains. Erika had helped Tom secure an additional $70 per month in food benefits, making a crucial difference in his life.

Tom's story is far from unique. Nearly 11.8 million adults over 50 were at risk of hunger in 2022, a 26% increase from the previous year.

Thanks to a chance call with Erika Murdoch, Tom McSpedden got more benefits—and enough to eat.

Yet, only 37% of eligible older adults participate in SNAP.

By partnering with community heroes like Erika, AARP Foundation is working to change this. In 2023, we helped 79,017 older adults with low income apply for public benefits like SNAP.

For Tom, the impact goes beyond just having enough to eat. "Going to bed, sleeping well, waking up with a different attitude. I consider her [Erika] a friend," he shares.

HOW WE'RE FIGHTING FOR YOU

AARP TAKES ON AGING WELL

AS THE chief public policy officer at AARP, I have spent the past decade working to improve the lives of people and their families as they age. Yet as I approached my own 50th birthday, I asked myself the questions I'd been studying for years: How long will I live? Will I stay healthy? How long will I work? Who will care for me?

In search of answers, I talked to older people and experts and looked at new research in science and medicine. The result is my new book, The Second Fifty: Answers to the 7 Big Questions of Midlife and Beyond (W.W. Norton & Company, 2024).

Here are a few of the surprising things I learned.

► Health has less to do with genes than environment and behavior.

You've probably seen lists of the five healthy habits: a good diet, regular exercise, healthy body weight, no smoking, and limited or no alcohol. Practice four of these five habits and you can gain eight to 10 years free of major medical problems. But a sense of purpose may also help us live longer. And staying connected through work, volunteering or close relationships is crucial. Healthy relationships are linked to better immune functioning, lower blood pressure and lower levels of inflammation.

► Mindset matters. A widespread misconception is that aging is strictly a time of decline. Research AARP undertook with National Geographic found that people in their 70s and 80s were almost twice as happy as those in their 40s and 50s. And studies by Becca Levy, a professor at Yale, show that people who view aging positively live more than seven years longer than those with the most negative attitudes.

► Decline is not inevitable. Some cognitive faculties actually improve as we age, and we also tend to become more resilient emotionally. Plus, we can take steps to support our brain health. Adopting those five healthy habits helps lower the risk of dementia by up to one-third.

► We can't do it alone. If we are going to create a society where Americans can flourish in their second 50, we need leaders with solutions that make it easier to age well. That's why AARP and our network of advocates fight to improve and protect systems like Medicare and Social Security that support us as we get older. Find out more about the book at aarp.org/TheSecondFifty. All of AARP's royalties from book sales support the charitable work of AARP Foundation. —Debra Whitman
